Dryden, Sig. and Guis., I. 243.

4. To assume the appearance of; appear like; imitate.

The gold dissembled well her yellow hair.
Dryden.

= Sp. 2. Dissimular, Simular, Dissimular, Disguise, cloak, cover. (See hide.) To dissemble is to pretend that a thing which is not: as, to dissemble one's real sentiments. To simulate is to pretend that a thing which is not is: as, to simulate friendship. To dissimulate is to hide the reality or truth of something under a diverse or contrary appearance: as, to dissimulate one's poverty by ostentation. To disguise is to put under a false guise, to keep a thing from being recognized by giving it a false appearance: as, I cannot disguise from myself the fact. See dissimular and conceal.

I thought it best, however, to dissemble my wrath, and to treat them with promises and fair words, until . . . an opportunity of vengeance should be afforded me.
Poe, Tales, I. 4.

The scheme of simulated insanity is precisely the one he [Hamlet] would have been likely to hit upon, because it enabled him to follow his own bent.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 221.

Compelled to disguise their sentiments, they will not, however, suppress them.

I. D'Israeli, Calam. of Authors, II. 276.

II. trans. 1. To give a false appearance; make a deceptive impression or presentation.

What wicked and dissembling glass of mine
Made me compare with Hecuba's sphyry cyme?
Shak., M. N. D., II. 2.

2. To assume a false seeming; conceal the real fact, motives, intention, or sentiments under some pretense; mask the truth about one's self.

Ye dissembled in your hearts when ye sent me unto the Lord your God, saying, Pray for us.
Jer. xlii. 20.

I did dissemble with her Myself to satisfy.

William Guisemen (Child's Ballads, III. 30).

To seeming sadness she composed her look;
As if by force subjected to his will,
Though pleas'd, dissembling, and a woman still.
Dryden, Cym. and Iph., I. 311.

dissembler (di-sem'bler), n. One who dissembles, etc.; one who conceals his opinions, character, etc., under a false appearance; one who pretends that a thing which is not.

The French are passing courtly, ripe of wit, Kind, but extreme dissemblers.

Ford, Love's Sacrifice, I. 1.

A deep dissembler, not of his affections only, but of religion.
Milton, Miscellaneous.

= Sp. 2. Dissimular, Hypocrite. A dissembler is one who tries to conceal what he is; a hypocrite, one who tries to make himself appear to be what he is not, especially to seem better than he is. See dissimular.

The old sovereign of the world [Tiberius as depicted by Tacitus], . . . conscious of falling strength, raging with capricious sensuality, yet to the last the keenest of observers, the most artful of dissemblers, and the most terrible of masters.
Mason, on History.

Wee unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness.
Mat. xxiii. 27.

dissemblingly (di-sem'bling-ly), adv. In a dissembling manner; deceptively.

And yet dissemblingly he thought to delude and to play.
Dram., tr. of Horace's Satires, I. 3.

disseminate (di-sem'i-nat), v. t.; pret. and pp. disseminated, pp. disseminating. [< L. disseminatus, pp. of disseminare (> It. disseminare = Sp. dissemiar = Pg. disseminar = F. disséminer), scatter seed, < dis-, apart, + seminare, sow; see dis- and seminate.] 1. To scatter or sow, as seed, for propagation.

Seeds are disseminated by their minuteness—by their capsule being converted into a light balloon-like envelope— . . . by having hooks and grappels of many kinds and serrated awns, so as to adhere to the fur of quadrupeds—and by being furnished with wings and plumes as different in shape as elegant in structure, so as to be wafted by every breeze.
Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 187.

Hence—2. To spread by diffusion or dispersion: generally with reference to some intended or actual result.

A uniform heat disseminated through the body of the earth.
Woodward.

The Jews are disseminated through all the trading parts of the world.
Addison, Spectator.

3. To scatter by promulgation, as opinions or doctrines; propagate by speech or writing.

Nor can we certainly learn that any one philosopher of note embraced our religion, till it had been for many years preached, and disseminated, and had taken deep root in the world.
Sp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. iii.

Alexis. Sirs, I never have attempted to disseminate my opinions.

Peter. How couldst thou? the seed would fall only on granite.
Landon, Peter the Great and Alexis.

dissemination (di-sem-i-nat'shun), n. [= F. dissémination = Sp. diseminacion = Pg. disseminacion = It. disseminazione, < L. disseminatio (> dis-, apart, + seminare, pp. disseminatus, scatter seed; see disseminate.] 1. The act of sowing or scattering seed for propagation. Hence—2. A spreading abroad for some fixed purpose or with some definite effect; propagation by means of diffusion or dispersion; extension of the influence or establishment of something.

He therefore multiplied them to a great necessity of a dispersion, that they might serve the ends of God and of the natural law, by their ambulatory life and their numerous disseminations.

Jer. Taylor, Great Exemplar, Pref., p. 12.

That dispersion, or rather dissemination (of people after the flood), hath peopled all other parts of the world.
Sp. Pearson, Expos. of Creed, I.

3. Propagation by means of promulgation; a spreading abroad for or with acceptance, as of opinions.

The Gospel is of universal dissemination.

Jer. Taylor, Great Exemplar, I. § 4.

The dissemination of speculative notions about liberty and the rights of man.
Horsley, Speech on Slave Trade.

disseminative (di-sem'i-nat-iv), a. [< L. disseminatus + -ive.] Tending to disseminate or to become disseminated.

Heresy is, like the plague, infectious and disseminative.

Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, iv. 1.

disseminator (di-sem'i-nat-er), n. [= Sp. diseminador = It. disseminatore, < L. L. disseminator, < L. disseminare, pp. disseminatus, disseminate; see disseminate.] One who or that which disseminates or spreads by propagation.

The open canvas, picturesque disseminator of diseases have all been closed.
The American, XII. 10.

disension (di-sen'shun), n. [Formerly also disension; < ME. disencion, disencion, < OF. disencion, disencion, F. disension = Pr. disencion, disencion = Sp. disension = Pg. disension = It. disensione, < L. disensio (> dis-, agreement, disension, < disensire, pp. disensus, differ in opinion; see dissent, v.] Disagreement in opinion; especially, violent disagreement which produces warm debate or angry words; contention in words; strife; discord; quarrel; breach of friendship or union.

Paul and Barnabas had no small disension and dispute with them.
Acts xv. 2.

The Council of France procured a Reconciliation between the King and the Dauphin who had been in long Jealousies and Disension.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 183.

= Sp. 2. Disension, dispute, variance.

disensions, disensionally. See disensions, disensionally.

disensualism (di-sen'sh-al-izm), v. t.; pret. and pp. disensualized, pp. disensualizing. [< dis- priv. + sensualis.] To deprive of sensuality; render free from sensual qualities or tendencies.

We had our table so placed that the satisfaction of our hunger might be disensualized by the view from the window.
Lowell, Friends Travels, p. 233.

dissent (di-sent'), v. t. [< ME. disenten, < OF. disenter, F. disenter = Sp. disentr = Pg. disentr = It. disentrare, < L. disentrare, differ in opinion, disagree, differ; < dis-, apart, + sentire, feel, think.] 1. To be of a different or contrary opinion or feeling; withhold approval or assent: with from before the object.

As they were intimate friends, they took the freedom to dissent from one another in discourse, or upon occasion to speak a Latin sentence without fearing the imputation of pedantry or ill-breeding.
Addison, Ancient Medals, I.

The bill passed . . . without a dissenting voice.
Hallam.

In almost every period of the middle ages, there had been a few men who in some degree dissented from the common superstitions.
Lecky, Nationalism, I. 103.

It [science] dissents without scruple from those whom it reverences most.
J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 6.

2. Eccles., to refuse to acknowledge, conform to, or be bound by the doctrines or rules of an established church. See dissenter.—3. To differ; be of a different or contrary nature.

Every one ought to embrace the religion which is true, and to shun, as hurtful, whatever dissents from it, but that most which doth farthest dissent.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

dissent (di-sent'), n. [< dissent, v.] 1. The act of dissenting; a holding or expressing of a different or contrary opinion; refusal to be bound by an opinion or a decision that is contrary to one's own judgment.

If bare possibility may at all intangle our assent or dissent in things, we cannot fully misbelieve the absurdities fable in Æsop or Orid.

Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism, I. ix. § 3.

2. A declaration of disagreement in opinion about something; as, the minority entered their dissent on the records of the house.—3. Eccles., refusal to acknowledge or conform to the doctrines, ritual, or government of an established church, particularly in England and Scotland.

In religion there was no open dissent, and probably very little secret heresy.
Mausley, Hallam's Const. Hist.

The open expression of difference and avowed opposition to that which is authoritatively established constitutes Dissent, whether the religion be Pagan or Christian, Monotheistic or Polytheistic.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 238.

4. Contrariety of nature; opposite quality.

Where the menstrua are the same, and yet the incorporation followeth not, the dissent is in the metals.
Bacon.

dissentaneous (dis-en-tā-nē-us), a. [= Pg. It. dissenteño, < L. dissenteñus, disagreeing, < dissentire, disagree; see dissent, v. Cf. consentaneous.] Disagreeing; contrary; inconsistent.

They dissent it as dissentaneous to the Christian religion.
Rycaut, Greek and Armenian Churches, p. 303.

Dissentaneous argument in logic, a middle term for argumentation drawn from the opposites of the terms of the question.

dissentant (dis'en-tā-ni), a. [< L. dissenteñus, disagreeing; see dissentaneous.] Dissentaneous; inconsistent.

The parts are not discrete or dissentant, for both conclude not putting away, and consequently in such a form the proposition is ridiculous.
Milton, Tetrachordon.

dissentation (dis-en-tā-shun), n. [Irreg. < dissent + -ation.] The act of dissenting; dispute.
W. Browne.

dissenter (di-sen'ter), n. 1. One who dissents; one who differs in opinion, or one who declares his disagreement.

'Twill be needless for me to treat as a casual, to convince the dissenter from this doctrine.

W. Montague, Devout Essays (1654), III. 104.

Specifically—2. Eccles., one who refuses to accept the authority or doctrines, or conform to the ritual or usages, of an established church; a nonconformist; specifically applied in England to those who, while they agree with the Church of England (which is Episcopal) in many essential doctrines, differ from it on questions of church government, relation to the state, and rites and ceremonies. The word appears to have come into use in the seventeenth century as synonymous with nonconformist, although its equivalent may be said to have arisen in Poland in the name dissentant, a term which first appears in the acts of the Warsaw Confederation of 1573, and there denotes a Polish Protestant, in contradistinction to a member of the established Catholic Church. The name dissenter is not ordinarily given to the Episcopalians in Scotland, though they dissent from the Established Church of Scotland, which is Presbyterian.—Dissenter (Chapels Act. See Lord Lyndhurst's Act, under act.—Dissenter (Marriages Act, an English statute of 1836 (6 and 7 Wm. IV., c. 35), authorizing marriages between persons who are not identified with the Church of England according to the rites of their own church.—Sp. 2. Nonconformist, etc. See Astetic.

dissenterism (di-sen'ter-izm), n. [< dissenter + -ism.] The spirit or the principles of dissent or of dissenters. [Rare.]

He . . . tried to lay plans for his campaign and heroic desperate attempts to resurrect the shop-keeping Dissenterism of Carlingford into a lofty Nonconformist ideal.
Mrs. Oliphant, Salem Chapel, III.

dissentience (di-sen'ahens), n. [< Dissentient: see -ence, -ce.] The state of dissenting; dissent. [Rare.]

Hence what appears to some an irreconcilable dissentience, an obstinate determination not to be convinced, may really have another character.

J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, I. 288.

dissentient (di-sen'ahent), a. and n. [= It. dissensiente, < L. dissensient (-t)s, ppr. of dissenare, dissent: see dissent, v.] I. a. Disagreeing; expressing dissent; dissenting.

Without one dissentient voice.

V. Knox, Winter Evenings, xxxvii.

The youthful friend, dissentient, reason'd still

Of the soul's prowess, and the subject will.

Crabbe, Works, V. 12.

Three of the four united colonies declared for war; yet the dissentient Massachusetts interrupted delay.

Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 250.

II. n. One who disagrees and declares his dissent.

There were eleven observers [of the sound-producing powers of four different kinds of gunpowder], all of whom, without a single dissentient, pronounced the sound of the fine-grain powder loudest of all. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 377.

dissenting (di-sen'ting), p. a. Having the character of dissent; belonging to or connected with a body of dissenters: as, a dissenting minister or congregation; a dissenting chapel. See dissenter. — Dissenting Churches Act. See Lord Lyndhurst's Act, under act.

dissentions, dissensions (di-sen'shuns), a. [< OF. dissencieux, dissencieux, < dissension, dissension: see dissension.] Of the nature of dissension; given to dissension; contentious; quarrelsome.

Either in religion they have a dissentious head, or in the commonwealth a factious head.

They love his grace but lightly

That fill his ears with such dissensions rumour.

dissipiment (di-sep'i-mnt), n. [< L. dissipimentum, less correctly dissipimentum, a partition, < L. dissipare, less correctly dissipare, separate, divide by a boundary, < dis-, apart, + sapire, less correctly sapire, hedge in, fence: see septum.] 1. In bot.: (a) A partition; especially, one of the partitions within ovaries and fruits formed by the coherence of the sides of the constituent carpels. Sporious or false dissipiments are partitions otherwise formed. (b) In hymenomycetous fungi, same as trama. — 2. In zool. and anat.: (a) In general, a septum or partition; that which puts asunder two or more things by coming between them: as, the dissipiment of the nostrils. (b) Specifically—(1) One of the imperfect horizontal plates which connect the vertical septa in corals, and divide the loculi between the septa into a series of intercommunicating cells. (2) The internal separation or division between the segments of annelids, as worms.—Tabular dissipiment, in the tabular corals, one of several horizontal plates reaching entirely across the cavity of the theca, one above the other. See tabulopore.

In the Tabulata, horizontal plates, which stretch completely across the cavity of the theca, are formed one above the other and constitute tabular dissipiments.

Huxley, Encyc. Brit., I. 130.

dissipimenta, n. Plural of dissipimentum. dissipimental (di-sep-i-men'tal), a. [< dissipiment + -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a dissipiment.

dissipimentum (di-sep-i-men'tum), n.; pl. dissipimenta (-t). [L.L.: see dissipiment.] A dissipiment.

dissert (di-sert'), v. t. [< F. dissertar = Sp. disertar = Pg. disertar, < L. disertare, discuss, argue, discourse, freq. of dissorere, pp. dissertus (usually disertus, as adj. well-spoken, fluent: see disert), discuss, argue, discourse about, lit. disjoin, i. e., set apart in order, < dis-, apart, + serere, join: see series. Cf. disert.] To discourse; expatiate.

A venerable sage, . . . whom once I heard disserting on the topic of religion.

Harris, Happiness.

As I once had some theatrical powers myself, I disserted on such topics with my usual freedom.

dissertate (dis'er-tat'), v. t.; pret. and pp. dissertated, ppr. dissertating. [< L. disertatus, pp. of disertare, argue, discuss, discourse about:

see dissert.] To discourse in the style of a dissertation; write dissertations. J. Foster.

dissertation (dis'er-tā'shun), n. [= D. dissertatio = Sw. dissertasjon = F. dissertation = Sp. disertación = Pg. disertação = It. dissertazione, < L.L. disertatio (-n-), a spoken dissertation, discourse, < L. disertare, pp. disertatus, discuss: see disert.] 1. A set or formal discourse.

He began to launch out into a long dissertation upon the affairs of the North.

Addison, The Political Upholsterer.

He was easily engaged in a keen and animated dissertation about Lochleven trout, and sea trout, and river trout, and ball trout, and char, which never rise to a fly.

Scott, Abbot, xiv.

2. A written essay, treatise, or dissertation: as, Newton's dissertations on the prophecies.

You would laugh at me, says Philander, should I make you a learned dissertation on the nature of rusta. I shall only tell you there are two or three sorts of them, which are extremely beautiful in the eyes of an antiquary, and preserve a coin better than the best artificial varnish.

dissertator (dis'er-tā-tor), n. [= F. dissertateur = Sp. disertador = Pg. disertador, < L.L. disertator, < L. disertare, pp. disertatus, discuss: see disert.] One who discourses formally; one who writes a dissertation.

Our dissertator learnedly argues. If these books lay untouched and unstirred, they must have mouldered away.

disserve (dis-serv'), v. t.; pret. and pp. disserved, ppr. disserving. [< OF. desservir, deservir, F. desservir = Pr. deservir = Sp. deservir = Pg. deservir = It. deservire, disservire, < L. dis-priv. + servire, serve: see serve. Cf. deserv.] To serve or treat badly; injure; do an ill turn to. [Rare.]

I have neither served nor disserved the interest of any party of christians.

Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, Ded.

He would receive no person who had disserved him into any favour or trust, without her privacy and consent.

A man may disservise God, disobey indications not of our own making but which appear, if we attend, in our consciences—he may disobey, I say, such indications of the real law of our being in other spheres besides the sphere of conduct.

M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, I.

disservice (dis-serv'is), n. [< F. desservice (= Sp. deservicio = Pg. deservicio = It. deservigio, disservizio), < desservir, disservire: see disserv, and cf. service.] Service resulting in harm rather than benefit; an ill turn, intentional or unintentional.

So that too easy and too severe decisions have alike done disservices to religion.

Sp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xiv.

My uncle Toby's wish did Dr. Slop a disservice which his heart never intended any man.

Stevens, Tristram Shandy, III. 1.

disserviceable (dis-serv'is-a-bl), a. [< dis-priv. + serviceable. Cf. disserv.] Of no service or advantage; hence, unhelpful; hurtful; detrimental.

I confess, there were some of those persons whose names deserve to live in our book for their piety, although their particular opinions were such as to be disserviceable unto the declared and supposed interests of our churches.

C. Mather, Mag. Christ., III. Int.

disserviceableness (dis-serv'is-a-bl-ness), n. The quality of being disserviceable; tendency to harm. Bayley, 1727.

dissemination, dissemination (di-sim'i-gna, -gn-ai), n. [dissemination (f) + -ce, -cy.] The act of starting or flying asunder.

disseminate (di-sim'i-gnt), v. [< L. disseminare (t), pp. of disseminare, fly apart, < dis-, apart, + seminare, leap: see solicit.] Starting or flying asunder; bursting open with some force, as the dry pod or capsule of some plants.

dissemination (dis-i-lah'gn), n. [Irreg. < L. disseminare, fly apart: see disseminate.] The act of bursting open; the act of starting or flying apart. [Rare.]

The air in the smaller having so much room in the greater to receive it, the dissemination of that air was great. Boyle, Works, I. 92.

disseminator (di-sim'i-lar), n. [= F. disseminateur = Sp. diseminador = Pg. diseminador, equiv. to It. diseminare, < L. disseminare, unlike, < dis-, priv. + seminare, like: see dis- and similar.] Unlike as to appearance, properties, or nature; not similar; different; heterogeneous: as, disseminator features; disseminator dispositions.

Two characters altogether disseminator are united in him. Macaulay, Macbride.

Disseminator foot. See fusus.—Disseminator whole, in logic, a whole whose parts are heterogeneous.

disseminability (di-sim-i-lar'i-ti), n. [= F. disseminabilité; as disseminable + -ity. Cf. similarity.] Unlikeness; want of resemblance; dissimilarity; difference: as, the disseminability of faces or voices.

We might account even for a greater disseminability by considering the number of ages during which the several swarms have been separated from the great Indian hive, to which they primarily belonged.

Sir W. Jones, The Chinese, vii.

disseminability (di-sim'i-lar-i), adv. In a disseminability manner.

disseminate (di-sim'i-lat), v. t.; pret. and pp. disseminated, ppr. disseminating. [< ML. disseminatus, pp. of disseminare (disseminare: see disseminate, disseminate), make unlike, < disseminare, unlike: see disseminate.] To make unlike; cause to differ. [Rare.]

dissemination (di-sim-i-lat-shn), n. [< disseminare: see action.] The act or process of rendering dissimilar or different.

Most of these assimilations and disseminations (in alphabetic form) may be traced to reasons of mere graphic convenience. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 332.

Specifically—(a) In philol., the change or substitution of a sound to or for another and a different sound when otherwise two similar sounds would come together or very close to each other, as in Latin disseminare for disseminare (from Latin disseminare, English number (= German nummer) from Latin numerus, etc. (b) In biol., catabolism (which see): opposed to assimilation.

disseminative (di-sim'i-lat-iv), a. [< disseminare + -ive.] Tending to render dissimilar or different; specifically, in biol., catabolic (which see): opposed to assimilative.

disseminator, v. t. See disseminate.
disseminator (dis-i-mil'i-tud), n. [= F. dissimilitude = Sp. disimilitud = Pg. disimilitude = It. dissimilitudine, < L. dissimilitudo (-tudin-), unlikeness, < disseminare, unlike: see disseminate, and cf. similitude.] 1. Unlikeness; want of resemblance; difference: as, a disseminator of form or character.

Every later one [church] endeavored to be certain degrees more removed from conformity with the church of Rome than the rest before had been: whereupon grew marvellous great disseminations.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, Pret., II.
Burgess, Letters, tr. by a Gentleman.

Where many disseminations can be observed, and but one similitude, it was better to let the shadow alone than hazard the substance.

Jos. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 303.

2. In rhet., a comparison by contrast.
dissemination (di-sim'i-gna), n. [< disseminare + -ance. Cf. dissemination.] Disseminating.

Bayley, 1737.
disseminate (di-sim'i-lat), v.; pret. and pp. disseminated, ppr. disseminating. [< L. disseminatus, pp. of disseminare, dissemble: see disseminate and dissemble, and cf. disseminate.] 1.

From. To simulate the contrary of; cause to appear different from the reality.

Public feeling required the meagreness of nature to be disseminated by tall baronades of trimmed curls and bows.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, III.

disseminate, Disseminate, etc. See disseminate.

II. intrins. To practise dissimulation; make pretence; feign.

disseminator (di-sim'i-lat), a. [ME. < L. disseminator, pp.: see the verb.] Dissembling; feigning.

Under smiling she was disseminator.

Henryson, Testament of Cresseid, l. 235.

dissemination (di-sim'i-lat-shn), n. [< ME. disseminatio = F. dissemination = Sp. diseminacion = Pg. disseminação = It. disseminazione, < L. disseminatio (n-), dissembling, < disseminare, pp. disseminare, dissemble, disseminate: see disseminate, dissemble.] The act of dissimulating; concealment of reality under a diverse or contrary appearance; feigning; hypocrisy; deceit.

Let love be without dissemination. Rom. xii. 9.

Before we discourse of this vice, it will be necessary to observe that the learned make a difference between simulation and dissemination. Simulation is a pretence of what is not, and dissemination a concealment of what is.

Trotter, No. 213.

I am arrived at last in the presence of a man so real and equal that I may drop even those undermost garments of dissemination, courtesy, and second thought, which men never put off.

Emerson, Friendship.

disseminator (di-sim'i-lat-shn), n. [= F. dissimulateur (OF. dissimulateur: see dissimulateur) = Sp. diseminador = Pg. diseminador = It. dissimulatore, < L. dissimulatore, < disseminare, pp. disseminare, dissemble: see disseminate.] One who dissimulates or feigns; a dissembler.

Disseminator as I was to others, I was like a guilty child before the woman I loved. Bulwer, Pelham, lxvii.

disseminator, disseminator, v. t. [< ME. dissimulen, dissimulen, < OF. dissimuler, F. dissimuler = Sp. disimular = Pg. disimular = It. dissimulare, < L. dissimulare, conceal, dissemble: see dissemble, disseminate.] To dissemble; conceal.

His wo he gan disseminator and hyde.

Howbeit this one thing he could neither disseminator nor pass over with silence.

Holland, tr. of Ammannus Marcellinus.

In the church, some errors may be disseminated with less inconvenience than they can be discovered.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

disseminator (di-sim'i-lat), n. A dissembler; one who dissimulates.

My duty is to exhort you . . . to search and examine your own consciences, and that not lightly, nor after the manner of disseminators with God.

The Order of the Communion (1549).

Christ calleth them hypocrites, disseminators, blind guides, and painted sepulchres.

Tyndale, Ann. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc., 1850), p. 45.

dissemination (di-sim'i-lat-shn), n. [< ME. dissimulatio, dissimulatio; verbal n. of disseminare, v.] The act of dissembling or dissimulating; dissimulation.

Swich subtil loking and dissemination.

Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 277.

disseminator, n. [ME. < OF. dissimulateur, dissimulateur, < L. dissimulatore, a dissembler: see disseminator.] A dissembler. Chaucer.

disseminator (dis-i-pa-bl), a. [< OF. dissipable, < L. dissipabilis, that may be dissipated, < dissipare, dissipate: see dissipate.] Liable to be dissipated; that may be scattered or dispersed.

[Rare.]

The heat of those plants is very dissipable.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

dissipate (dis-i-pat), v.; pret. and pp. dissipated, ppr. dissipating. [< L. dissipatus, pp. of dissipare, also written dissipare (< OF. dissiper, F. dissiper = Sp. dissipar = Pg. dissipar = It. dissipare), scatter, disperse, demoralize, destroy, squander, dissipate, < dis-, apart, + suppare, throw into.] 1. To cause to pass or melt away; scatter or drive off in all directions; dispel: as, wind dissipates fog; the heat of the sun dissipates vapor; mirth dissipates care.

The more clear light of the gospel . . . dissipated those foggy mists of error.

Selden, Illustrations of Drayton's Polyolbion, x.

The reader will perhaps find the rays of evidence thus brought to a focus, sufficient to dissipate the doubts that may hitherto have lingered with him.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 504.

The heat carried up by the ascending current at the equator . . . is almost wholly dissipated into the cold stellar space above. J. Croft, Climate and Cosmology, p. 9.

2. To expend wastefully; scatter extravagantly or improvidently; waste, as property by foolish outlay, or the powers of the mind by devotion to trivial pursuits.

The vast wealth that was left him, being reckoned no less than eighteen hundred thousand pounds, was in three years dissipated. By. Burnet, Hist. Reformation, an. 1509.

If he had any grain of virtue by descent, he has dissipated it with the rest of his inheritance.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, I. 2.

The extreme tendency of civilization is to dissipate all intellectual energy.

The extravagance of the court had dissipated all the means which Parliament had supplied for the purpose of carrying on offensive hostilities.

Macaulay, Sir William Temple.

disseminate, Disseminate, Disseminate, etc. These words are often interchangeable. Disseminate and dissipate, however, properly apply to the dispersion of things that vanish and are not afterward collected; dissipate is the more energetic, and dissipate is more often used figuratively: as, to dissipate vapor; to dissipate a fortune; to dissipate doubt; to dissipate uncertainty. Disseminate and dissipate are applied to things which may be again brought together: as, to dissipate or disseminate troops; or to things which are quite as real and tangible after scattering or dispersing as before: as, to gather up one's dissipated wits.

The first flashing of the candles upon that canvas had seemed to dissipate the dreamy stupor which was stealing over my senses.

Poe, Tales, I. 367.

From what source did he [the sun] derive that enormous amount of energy which, in the form of heat, he has been dissipating into space during past ages?

J. Croft, Climate and Cosmology, p. 308.

I saw myself the lambent easy light Gild the brown horror, and dissipate the night.

D. yden, Hind and Panther, II. 1280.

A dream of poison: such soon-speaking gear As will dissipate itself through all the veins.

Shak., R. and J., v. 1.

In the year 1484, the Earl of Richmond, with forty ships, and five thousand waged Britains, took to sea; but that Evening, by Tempest of Weather, his whole Fleet was dissipated.

Baker, Chronicle, p. 220.

A king that sitteth in the throne of judgment scattereth away all evil with his eyes.

II. intrins. 1. To become scattered, dispersed, or diffused; come to an end or vanish through dispersion or diffusion.—2. To engage in extravagant, excessive, or dissolute pleasures; be loose in conduct.

dissipation (dis-i-pat-shn), n. [= F. dissipation, v.] Indulging in or characterized by extravagant, excessive, or dissolute pleasures; intemperance, especially in the use of intoxicating drinks: as, a dissipated man; a dissipated life.

dissipation (dis-i-pat-shn), n. [< F. dissipation = Sp. dissipacion = Pg. dissipação = It. dissipazione, < L. dissipatio (n-), a scattering, < dissipare, pp. dissipatus, scatter: see dissipate.] 1. The act of dissipating, dissipating, or dispersing; the state of being dissipated; a passing or wasting away: as, the dissipation of vapor or heat; the dissipation of energy.

This was their vain arrogance and presumption, . . . when their guilty consciences threatened a dissipation and scattering by divine justice. Purshas, Pilgrimage, p. 45.

Foul dissipation follow'd, and forced rout.

The dissipation of those renowned churches.

C. Mather, Mag. Chris., iv, Int.

2. The act of wasting by misuse; wasteful expenditure or loss: as, the dissipation of one's powers or means in unsuccessful efforts.—3. Distraction of the mind and waste of its energy, as by diverse occupations or objects of attention; anything that distracts the mind or divides the attention.

A dissipation of thought is the natural and unavoidable effect of our conversing much in the world.

Sp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. x.

More reading is not mental discipline, but rather mental dissipation.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXV. 245.

4. Undue indulgence in pleasure; specifically, the intemperate pursuit of enjoyment through excessive use of intoxicating drink, and its attendant vices.

What! is it proposed then to reclaim the spendthrift from his dissipation and extravagance, by filling his pockets with money?

Wirt.

Circle of dissipation, in optics, the circular space upon the retina of the eye which is taken up by one of the extreme pencils of rays issuing from any object.—Dissipation function. See function.—Dissipation of energy. See energy.—Radius of dissipation, the radius of the circle of dissipation.

dissipative (dis-i-pat-iv), a. [< dissipare + -ive.] 1. Tending to dissipate or disperse; dissipative.

For as it is a distinction between living and non-living bodies that the first propagate while the second do not, it is also a distinction between them that certain actions which go on in the first are cumulative, instead of being, as in the second, dissipative.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 324.

2. Of or pertaining to the phenomenon of the dissipation of energy. See energy.—Dissipative function. Same as dissipativity (b).—Dissipative system, in physics, a system in which energy is dissipated.

dissipativity (dis-'i-pé-tiv'-i-ti), n. [dissipare + -ity.] In physics: (a) Half the rate of the dissipation of energy in any given system. (b) The function which expresses this half rate.

The electric energy U, the magnetic energy T, and the dissipativity Q.
Philos. Mag., XXV. 131.

dissite (di-'sit'), a. [L. dissitus, lying apart, remote, < L. dis-, apart, + situs, placed: see dis- and sit.] Situated apart; scattered; separate.

Far dissite from this world of ours, wherein we ever dwell.
Holland, tr. of Camden's Britain, p. 40.

dissociability (di-'sô-shi-'bl-i-ti), n. [dissipare + ability.] 1. Want of sociability. Warburton. [Rare].—2. Capability of being dissociated.

dissociable (di-'sô-shi-'bl), a. [F. dissociable, unseparable, dissociable, < L. dissociabilis, irreconcilable, < dissociare, separate: see dissociate.] 1. Not well associated, united, or assorted; not sociable; incongruous; not reconcilable.

They came in two by two, though matched in the most dissociable manner, and mingled together in a kind of dance.
Addison, Vision of Public Credit.

Not only all falsehood is incongruous to a divine mission, but is dissociable with all truth.
Warburton, Sermons, iii.

2. Capable of being dissociated.

When blood or a solution of oxyhemoglobin is shaken up with carbon monoxide, the "dissociable" or "respiratory" oxygen is displaced.
Encyc. Brit., XX. 484.

dissocial (di-'sô-shal), a. [L. dissocialis, irreconcilable, < L. dis-, priv. + socialis, social: see dis- and social.] 1. Unfriendly; interfering or tending to interfere with sociability or friendship.—2. Disinclined to or unsuitable for society; not social; contracted; selfish; as, a dissocial passion.

A dissocial man? Dissocial enough; a natural terror and horror to all phantasms, being himself of the genus reality.
Carlyle, French Rev., III. vii. 2.

dissocialize (di-'sô-shal-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. dissocialized, ppr. dissocializing. [dissocial + -ize.] To make unsocial; disunite. Clarke.

dissociate (di-'sô-shi-'t), v. t.; pret. and pp. dissociated, ppr. dissociating. [L. dissociatus, pp. of dissociare (> Sp. dissociar = Pg. dissociar = F. dissocier), separate from fellowship, disjoin, < dis-, priv. + sociare, associate, unite, < socius, a companion: see social.] 1. To sever the association or connection of; dissever; disunite; separate.

By thus dissociating every state from every other, like deer separated from the herd, each power is treated with on the merit of his being a deserter from the common cause.
Burke, A Regicide Peace.

Unable to dissociate appearance from reality, the savage, thinking the effigy of the dead man is inhabited by his ghost, propitiates it accordingly.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 158.

In passing into other races Christianity could not but suffer by being dissociated from the tradition of Jewish prophecy. It could not but lose the prophetic spirit, the eager study of the future.
J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 222.

Specifically.—2. In chem., to separate the elements of; decompose by dissociation.

Carbonic oxide, sulphuric acid, hydrochloric acid, ammonia, and hydriodic acid have been dissociated by various chemists.
Amer. Cyc., VI. 140.

dissociation (di-'sô-shi-'shon), n. [F. dissociation = Sp. dissociación = Pg. dissociación, < L. dissociatio(n)-, a separation, < dissociare, pp. dissociatus, separate: see dissociate. Cf. association, consociation.] 1. The severance of association or connection; separation; disunion.

It will add . . . to the dissociation, distraction, and confusion of these confederate republics.
Burke, Rev. in France.

The dissociation reaches its extreme in the thoughts of the man of science.
H. Spencer, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIV. 348.

Specifically.—2. In chem., the resolution of more complex into simpler molecules by the action of heat. Also called thermolysis. Dissociation is applied by some authors to cases where the dissociated gases recombine when the temperature falls, and thermolysis where the gases do not spontaneously recombine on cooling. Also dissociation.

The word was first employed by Henri Sainte-Claire Deville, who in November, 1867, read before the French Academy of Sciences a paper "On the Dissociation or Spontaneous Decomposition of Bodies under the Influence of Heat."
Amer. Cyc., VI. 128.

dissociative (di-'sô-shi-'tiv), a. [dissociate + -ive.] Tending to dissociate; specifically, in chem., resolving or reducing a compound to its primary elements.

The resolution of carbonic acid into its elements . . . is one of the most familiar instances of this transformation of solar radiation into dissociative action. Edinburgh Rev.

dissocioscope (di-'sô-shi-'ô-skôp), n. [Irreg. < dissociation > < Gr. σκοπεω, view.] A form of apparatus devised by Tommasi for showing the dissociation of ammoniacal salts. It consists of a glass tube within which is placed a strip of blue litmus paper moistened with a neutral solution of ammonium chloride. If the tube is plunged into boiling water, the ammonium chloride is dissociated and the litmus-paper becomes red; in cold water, the ammonia and hydrogen chloride recombine and the paper becomes blue again.

dissolubility (dis-'ô-lû-'bi-l-i-ti), n. [= F. dissolubilité = Sp. disolubilidad; as dissoluble + -ity: see -bility.] Capacity of being dissolved. Sir M. Hale.

dissoluble (dis-'ô-lû-'bl), a. [= F. dissoluble = Sp. disoluble = Pg. disoluble = It. dissolubile, < L. dissolubilis, that may be dissolved, < dissolvere, dissolve: see dissolve.] 1. Capable of being dissolved; convertible into a fluid.—2. That may be disunited or separated into parts.

The gentler shade that walked Elysian plains Might sometimes covet dissoluble chains.
Wordsworth, Departure from Grasmere.

If all be atoms, how then should the Gods Being atomic not be dissoluble?
Tennyson, Lucretius.

dissolubleness (dis-'ô-lû-'bl-ness), n. The quality of being dissoluble. Richardson.

dissolute (dis-'ô-lût), a. [ME. dissolūt = OF. dissolu, F. dissolu = Pr. dissolūt = Sp. disoluto = Pg. It. dissoluto, < L. dissolutus, loose, lax, careless, licentious, dissolute, pp. of dissolvere, loosen, unloose, dissolve: see dissolve.] 1. Loose; relaxed; enfeebled.

At last, by subtle sleights she him betrayed Unto his foe, a Gyaunt huge and tall:
Who him, dissolved, dissolute, dismayed, Unwares surprised.
Spenser, F. Q., I. vii. 51.

2. Loose in behavior and morals; not under the restraints of law; given to vice and dissipation; vicious; wanton; lewd; as, a dissolute man; dissolute company.—3. Characterized by dissoluteness; devoted to pleasure and dissipation: as, a dissolute life.

And forasmuch as we be in hand with laughing, which is a sign of a very light and dissolute mind, let her see that shee laugh not unmeasurably.

Vice, Instruction of a Christian Woman, I. 4.
They made themselves garlands, and ran vp and downe after a dissolute manner.
J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, viii.

They are people of very dissolute habits.
H. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, II. 61.

—Syn. 2 and 3. Immoral, depraved, etc. (see criminal), uncurbed, unbridled, disorderly, wild, rakish, lax, licentious, profligate, abandoned, reprobate.

dissoluted (dis-'ô-lût-ed), p. a. [Pp. of **dissoluto*, v.] Loosened; unconfinned.

The next, mad Mathias: her feet all bare, Ungirt, untrimm'd, with dissoluted hair.
C. Smart, Temple of Dulness.

dissolutely (dis-'ô-lût-ly), adv. 1. In a loose or relaxed manner; so as to loosen or set free.

Then were the prisons dissolutely freed,
Both field and town with wretchedness to fill.
Dryden, Barons' Wars, iv.

2. Unrestrainedly.

I have seen foraine Embassadors in the Queens presence laugh so dissolutely at some rare pastime or sport that hath bene made there, that nothing in the world could worse have become them.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poets, p. 244.

3. In a moral sense, loosely; wantonly; in dissipation or debauchery; without restraint: as, to spend money dissolutely.

The queen's subjects lived dissolutely, vainly, and luxuriously, with little fear of God and care of honesty.
Styrie, Alp. Parke, an. 1563.

dissoluteness (dis-'ô-lût-ness), n. Looseness of manners and morals; vicious indulgence in pleasure, as in intemperance and debauchery; dissipation: as, dissoluteness of life or manners.

Our civil confusions and distractions . . . do not only occasion a general licentiousness and dissoluteness of manners, but have usually a proportionally bad influence upon the order and government of families.
Tillotson, Sermons, I. 1.

dissolution (dis-'ô-lû-'shon), n. [ME. dissolucio(n), < OF. dissolution, F. dissolution = Pr. dissolucio = Sp. disolución = Pg. disolución = It. dissoluzione, < L. dissolutio(n)-, < dissolvere, pp. dissolutus, dissolve: see dissolve.] 1. The act of dissolving, or changing from a solid to a liquid state; the state of undergoing liquefaction.

A man . . . as subject to heat as butter; a man of continual dissolution and thaw. Shak., M. W. of W., III. 5. 2. The substance formed by dissolving a body in a menstruum; a solution. Bacon.—3. Separation into parts, especially into elementary or minute parts; disintegration; decomposition or resolution of natural structure, as of animal or vegetable substances. Specifically.—4. Death; the separation of soul and body.

Nobler minds fell often upon doubtful deaths and melancholy dissolutions. Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, iv.

We expected
Immediate dissolution, which we thought Was meant by death that day.
Milton, P. L., x. 1048.

He waits the day of his dissolution with a resignation mixed with delight.
Steele, Spectator, No. 382.

5. Separation of the parts which compose a connected system or body; as, the dissolution of nature; the dissolution of government.

For, doubtless, through dissolution
Proceeds dissolution.
Lauder, Devote of Kings (R. B. T. S.), l. 44.

To make a present dissolution of the world. Hooker.

If in any community loyalty diminishes at a greater rate than equity increases, there will arise a tendency toward social dissolution. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 464.

6. The process of retrogression or degeneration: opposed to evolution. [Rare.]

The evolution of a gas is literally an absorption of motion and disintegration of matter, which is exactly the reverse of that which we here call Evolution—is that which we here call Dissolution.
H. Spencer, First Principles, § 97.

7. The breaking up of an assembly or association of any kind, or the bringing of its existence to an end: as, a dissolution of Parliament, or of a partnership; the dissolution of the English monasteries under Henry VIII.

Dissolution is the civil death of Parliament. Blackstone.
Henry IV., in 1402, invited both houses to dine with him on the Sunday after the dissolution.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 448.

8. The act of relaxing or weakening; enervation; looseness or laxity, as of manners; dissipation; dissoluteness.

A longing after sensual pleasures is a dissolution of the spirit of a man, and makes it loose, soft, and wandering.
Jer. Taylor.

9. The determination of the requisites of a mathematical problem.—Dissolution of the blood, in med., that state of the blood in which it does not readily coagulate when withdrawn from the body.—Syn. 4 and 5. Termination, destruction, ruin.—7. Recess, protraction, etc. See adjournment.

dissolutive (dis-'ô-lû-'tiv), a. [L. dissolutus, pp. of dissolvere, dissolve (see dissolve), + -ive.] Dissolving in the chemical sense.

Because these last mentioned are the most unlikely to be readily dissoluble by a substance belonging to the animal kingdom, . . . I shall subjoin two trials that I made to evince this dissolutive power of the spirit of blood.
Boyle, Human Blood.

dissolvability (di-'sol-'vâ-'bi-l-i-ti), n. [dissolve + -ability.] Capability of being dissolved; solubility.

dissolvable (di-'sol-'vâ-'bl), a. [dissolve + -able.] Capable of being dissolved; that may be converted into a liquid: as, sugar and ice are dissolvable bodies. Also dissoluble.

Man, that is even upon the intrinsic constitution of his nature dissoluble, must, by being in an eternal duration, continue immortal. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

dissolvableness (di-'sol-'vâ-'bl-ness), n. The character or state of being soluble.

dissolve (di-'zolv'), v.; pret. and pp. dissolved, ppr. dissolving. This device acts . . . as a pyromagnetic motor, the heat now passing through the tubes in such a way as to produce a dissymmetry in the lines of force from the field.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LVIII, 138.

dissymmetry (dis-sim'pē-thi), n. [dis- priv. + symmetry.] Want of sympathy or interest; indifference. Johnston. [Rare.]

dist. An abbreviation of district: as, Dist. Atty., District Attorney.

distacklet (dis-tak'let), v. t. [dis- priv. + tackle.] To divest of tackle or rigging.

At length, these instruments of their long wanderings . . . tossed their distackled feet to the shore of Libya.
Warner, Albion's England, Addition to II.

distad (dis'tad), adv. [dist(ance) + -ad.] In anat., away from the center; from within outward; toward the surface or end of the body.

distaff (dis'taf), n.; pl. distaffs (-tāfs), rarely distaffs (-tāvz). [ME. distaf, distaf, distestaf, distestaf, < AS. distaf, distaf, distaff, < **dis* (> late ME. disen, dynen, furnish a distaff with flax, E. disen, dial. dix, deck out, array) (prob. = East Fries. disen = LG. dissen, the bunch of flax on the distaff, > G. dial. dissen (naut.), tow, oakum) + staf, staff: see dis, disen, and staff. A connection of the first element with OHG. dehaca, MHG. dehaca, a distaff, < (MHG.) dehaca, break or swingle flax (orig. prepare, form, fashion as with a hatchet, ax, or other implement), whence also OHG. dehala, a hatchet, ax, etc. (see ask), is doubtful.] 1. In the earliest method of spinning, the staff, usually a cleft stick about 3 feet long, on which was wound a quantity of wool, cotton, or flax to be spun. The lower end of the distaff was held between the left arm and the side, and the thread, passing through and guided by the fingers of the left hand, was drawn out and twisted by those of the right, and wound on a suspended spindle made so as to be revolved like a top, which completed the twist. In Eastern countries and in some districts of Europe, especially in Italy, the primitive distaff and spindle are still used; but after the introduction of the spinning-wheel into Europe, about the fifteenth century, the distaff became an attachment only of that designed for flax, and thus continued in general use till a recent period, modified in form. The loaded distaff in the left hand placed, With spongy coils of snow-white wool was graced; From these the right hand lengthening fibres drew, Which into thread 'neath nimble fingers grew.
Catulus (trans.).

He's so below a beating that the women find him not worthy of their distaff.
Bacon, and Fl., King and No King, v. 1.

2. Figuratively, a woman, or the female sex. His crown usurped, a distaff on the throne. Dryden.

Distaff day, or Saint Distaff's day, the day after Twelfth-day, or the festival of Epiphany; formerly so called in England because on that day the women resumed their distaffs and other ordinary employments, after the relaxation of the holidays.—Distaff side, or distaff side of the house, an old collective phrase for the female members of a family, as the distaff was always used by women, and was common among all ranks; used especially with reference to relationship and descent, and opposed to gentle side: as, he is connected with this family on the distaff side; he traces his descent through the distaff side of the house. Also called spindle side.

distain (dis-tān'), v. t. [ME. disteinen, disteigenen, < OF. destaindre, destaindre, F. déteindre = Pr. destingner = Sp. destenir = Pg. destingir = It. stignere, stignere, distain, take away the color, < L. dis- priv. + stingere, tinge, color: see dis and stingere, tint, taint. Now abbr. stain, q. v.] 1. To take away the color of; hence, to weaken the effect of by comparison; cause to pale; outvie.

And thou, Tebbe, that hast of love such peyne,
 My lady comlyth, that all this may disteine.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 302.

2. To tinge with any color different from the natural or proper one; discolor; stain: as, a sword distained with blood. [Archaic.]

Divers of the women I have seen with their chinnies distained into knots and flowers of blue, made by pricking of the skin with needles. Sandys, Travels, p. 85.

Colors that distain
 The cheeks of Proteus or the silken train
 Of Flora's nymphs. Quarles, Emblems, III, 14.

 If that the praise'd himself bring the praise forth.
Shak., T. and C., l. 2.

Have ye fair daughters? Look
 To see them live, torn from your arms, distained, Dishonored. Macbride, Blends.

distal (dis'tal), a. [dist(ance) + -al, on analogy of central.] In anat., situated away from the center of the body; being at the end; terminal; peripheral: the opposite of proximal: as, the distal end of a limb, a bone, or other part or organ. Thus, the nails are at the distal ends of the fingers; the distal extremity of the thigh-bone is at the knee; the distal organs or appendages of a hydroscoen are at the end of the main stem.

An insect, in entering . . . to smok the nectar, would depress the distal portion of the labellum [in Epischura palustris], and consequently would not touch the rostellum.
Darwin, Fertil. of Orchids by Insects, p. 97.

distally (dis'tal-ly), adv. In a distal situation or direction; toward the distal end or extremity; remotely; terminally; peripherally.

The humerus is a stout bone—prismatic, and with a rounded head at its proximal end, flattened and broad distally.
Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 185.

distant, v. t. [A var. of distance, v.] To keep separate; distinguish.

For an I war dead, and ye war dead,
 And both in a grave laid, O
 And ye and I war tane up again,
 Wha could distant your mools frae mine, O?
Laird of Drum (Child's Ballads, IV, 122).

distance (dis'tans), n. [ME. distance, disteance, disteance = D. distantie = G. distans = Dan. distance = Sw. distans, < OF. distance, disteance, distance, separation, disagreement, disaccord, F. distance, distance, = Pr. Sp. Pg. distancia = It. distanza, distanza, < L. distantia, distance, remoteness, difference, < distans (t), distant: see distans.] 1. The measure of the interval between two objects in space, or, by extension, between two points of time; the length of the straight line from one point to another, and hence of time intervening between one event or period and another: as, the distance between New York and San Francisco; the distance of two events from each other; a distance of five miles; events only the distance of an hour apart. In navigation distances are usually measured along rhumb-lines.

Space considered barely in length between any two beings, without considering any thing else between them, is called distance. Locke, Human Understanding, II, xlii, 2.

2. A definite or measured space to be maintained between two divisions of a body of troops, two combatants in a duel, or the like: as (in command), take your distances.

He fights as you sing prick-song, keeps time, distance, and proportion.
Shak., R. and J., II, 4.

3. In horse-racing, the space measured back from the winning-post which a horse, in heat-races, must have reached when the winning horse has covered the whole course in order to be entitled to enter subsequent heats. In the United States the distances for trotting-races are (1890) as follows: Mile-heats, 80 yards; two-mile heats, 160 yards; three-mile heats, 240 yards; mile-heats, best three in five, 100 yards; four-mile heats, 320 yards. The distances for running-races are as follows: Three-quarter-mile heats, 25 yards; mile-heats, 80 yards; two-mile heats, 80 yards; three-mile heats, 60 yards; four-mile heats, 70 yards. A horse which fails to reach the distance-post before the heat has been won, or whose rider or driver is adjudged to have made certain specified errors, is said to be distanced.

This was the horse that ran the whole field out of distance.
Sir R. L. Estlin.

4. In music, the interval or difference between two tones. See interval.—5. Remoteness of place or time; a remote place or time: as, at a great distance; a light appeared in the distance.

Twere an ill World, I'll swear, for ev'ry Friend,
 If Distance could their Union end.
Cowley, Friendship in Absence, st. 3.

'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view,
 And robes the mountain in its azure hue.
Campbell, Pleasures of Hope, l. 7.

distemper<sup>2</sup> (dis-tem'per), n. [Also written destemper; = F. détempre, distemper, water-colors, a painting in water-colors; from the verb.]

1. A method of painting in which the colors are mixed with any binding medium soluble in water, such as yolk of egg and an equal quantity of water, yolk and white of egg beaten together and mixed with an equal quantity of milk, fig-tree sap, vinegar, wine, ox-gall, etc. Strictly speaking, distemper painting is painting in water-color with a vehicle of which yolk of egg is the chief ingredient, upon a surface usually of wood or canvas, covered with a ground of chalk or plaster mixed with gum, this ground itself being frequently called distemper. See distemper-ground. If the glutinous medium is present in too great quantity, the colors will scale off when the painting is exposed to the air, so that they should be applied in thin layers and not be retouched until they are perfectly dry.

They glued a linnen cloth upon the wall, and covered that with plaister, on which they painted in distemper.
Walpole, Anecdotes of Painting, I. 44.

This mode of painting (tempera), which is undoubtedly the most ancient, and which, in trade purposes, is called distemper painting, derives its name from the fact that the colours are "tempered" or mixed with some liquid or medium to bind their separate particles to each other and to the surface to which the paint is to be applied.

Field's Grammar of Colouring (ed. Davidson), p. 100.

2. A pigment prepared for painting according to this method.

How such ideas of the Almighty's power

(Ideas not absurd) distend the thought!

Young, Night Thoughts, ix.

2. To stretch in any direction; extend. [Rare.]

Upon the earth my body I distend.

Stirling, Aurora, II.

What mean those colour'd streaks in heaven

Distended, as the brow of God appeared?

Milton, P. L., xi. 880.

3. To widen; spread apart. [Rare.]

The warmth distends the chinks.

Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, I.

II. intrans. To become distended; swell.

And now his heart

Distends with pride. Milton, P. L., I. 572.

distended (dis-tend'), p. a. [pp. of dis-tend, v.] In entom., dilated: as, distended tarsi.
[Rare.]

distender (dis-ten'dér), n. One who or that which distends.

distensibility (dis-ten-si-bil'i-ti), n. [< distensible: see -ibility.] The quality of being distensible; capacity for distention.

Its [the spleen's] yielding capsule and its veins, remarkable for their large calibre and great distensibility, even when the distending force is small.

Quain, Med. Dict., p. 1809.

distensible (dis-ten'si-bl), a. [< L.L. distensus, later form of L. distensus, pp. of distendere, dis-tend (see distend), + -ible.] Capable of being distended, dilated, or expanded.

distension, n. See distention.

distensive (dis-ten'siv), a. [= It. stensivo, < L.L. distensus, later form of L. distensus, pp. of distendere, distend; see distend.] 1. That may be distended.—2. Having the property of dis-tending; causing distention. Smart.

distent (dis-ten'), a. and n. [< L. distensus, pp.
of distendere, stretch asunder; see distend.] I.
a. Spread; distended. [Rare.]

Nostrils in play, now distent, now distracted.

L. Wallace, Ben-Hur, p. 260.

II. n. Breadth.

distention (dis-ten'shun), n. [< L. distensio(n), < distendere, pp. distensus, stretch asunder; see distend.] 1. The act of distending, or the state of being distended; dilatation; a stretching in all directions; inflation: as, the distention of the lungs or stomach.—2. A stretching in any direction; extension. [Rare.]

Our legs do labour more in elevation than in distention.

Sir H. Wotton, Elem. of Architecture.

distert (dis-tér'), v. t. [< OF. desterrer, F. deterrer, deprive of one's country, also dig or take out of the ground, < L. dis- priv. + terra, land, country, earth. Cf. atter, inter.] To banish from a country.

The Moors, whereof many thousands were disterted and banished hence to Barbary. Hovell, Letters, I. i. 24.

distermine (dis-tér-mi-nät), a. [< L. distermi-natus, pp. of distermine (> It. distermine), separate by a boundary, < dis-, apart, + termi-nare, set a boundary, < terminus, a boundary: see term, terminate.] Separated by bounds.

There is one and the same church of Christ, however far distermine in places; however segregated and infinitely severalled in persons. Sp. Hall, The Peace-Maker, I. 2.

distermination (dis-tér-mi-nä'shun), n. [< dis-termine: see -ation.] Separation; secession.

This turning out of the church, this church-banishment or distermination. Hammond, Works, I. 450.

disthene (dis'thén), n. [< Gr. di-, two-, + sthen-, strength.] Cyanite: a mineral so called by Hedy on account of its unequal hardness, and because its crystals have the property of being electrified both positively and negatively.

disthroner (dis-thrón'), v. t. [< OF. desthroner, < dis- priv. + throne, a throne: see dis- and throne. Cf. dethrone.] To dethrone.

Nothing can possibly disthroner them but that which cast the angels from heaven, and man out of paradise.

disthronise (dis-thrón'is), v. t. [< dis- priv. + throne + -ise.] To dethrone.

By his death he it recovered:

But Peridure and Vigent him disthronised.

Spenser, F. Q., II. x. 44.

distich (dis'tik), a. and n. [First, in E., as a noun; sometimes as L., distichon; early mod.
E. also distick; < L. distichon, < Gr. di-stichon, a distich, noun, of di-stichos, having two rows or verses, < di-, two-, + stichos, a row, rank, line, verse: see stich.] I. a. Having two rows:
same as distichous.

II. n. In pros., a group or system of two lines or verses. A familiar example is the elegiac distich. (See elegiac.) A distich in modern and riming poetry is more generally called a couplet.

The first distance for the most part goeth all by distich, or couples of verses agreeing in one cadence.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 70.

distichiasis (dis-ti-ki'ä-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. distichos, having two rows: see distich.] A malformation consisting of a double row of eyelashes.

Distichodontinae (dis'ti-kō-don-ti'nē), n. pl.
[NL., < Distichodus (-odont-) + -inae.] A subfamily of Characnidae, having an adipose fin, the teeth in both jaws well developed, the dorsal fin short, rather elongate, and gill-openings of moderate width, the gill-membranes being attached to the isthmus. The species are all African. Also Distichodontina.

Distichodus (dis-tik'ō-dus), n. [NL., < Gr. distichos, with two rows (see distich), + ōdōs (ōdōr) = E. tooth.] A genus of characinoid fishes, representing a subfamily Distichodontinae. Also Distichodon. Müller and Troschel.

Distichopora (dis-ti-kōp'ō-rä), n. [NL., < Gr. di-stichos, having two rows (see dis-tick), + pōros, a pore.] A genus of hydrocorallines, representing the family
Distichoporidae.

Distichoporidae (dis'ti-kō-por'i-dē), n. pl.
[NL., < Distichopora + -idae.] A family of hydrozoans, of the order Hydrocorallinae.

distichous (dis'ti-kus), a. [< Gr. di-stichos, having two rows: see distich.] Disposed in two rows; biserial; bifarious; dichotomous; specifically, in bot., arranged alternately in two vertical ranks upon opposite sides of the axis, as the leaves of grasses, elms, etc. Also dis-tich.—Distichous antennae, in en-tom., antennae in which the joints have on each side, near the apex, a long process which is directed forward, lying against the succeeding joint; a modification of the biplicate type.

Distichopora foliosa.

Distichous Leaves.

distichously (dis-ti-kus-ly), adv. In a distichous manner; in two rows or ranks: as, distichously branched stems.

distill, distill (dis-til'), v.; pret. and pp. distilled, distilling. [ME. distillen = D. distillare = G. destillieren = Dan. destillere = Sw. destillera, < OF. distiller, F. distiller = Pr. distillar = Sp. destilar = Pg. distillar = It. distillare, distillare, < L. distillare, also and preferably written destillare, drop or trickle down, < de, down, + stillare, drop, < stilla, a drop: see still, e., which is an abbr. of distill. Cf. instill.] I. intrans. 1. To drop; fall in drops.

Soft showers distill'd, and suns grow warm in vain.
Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 54.

Flowers in tears of heav'n distill.

Scott, l. of L. M., v. 1.

Peace, silent as dew, will distill on you from heaven.
Channing, Perfect Life, p. 24.

2. To flow in a small stream; trickle.

The Ephrates distill'd out of the mountains of Armenia.
Raleigh, Hist. World.

High rocky mountains, from whence distill innumerable sweet and pleasant springs.

Capt. John Smith, True Travels, l. 118.

3. To use a still; practise distillation.
II. trans. 1. To let fall in drops; dispense by drops; hence, to shed or impart in small portions or degrees.

The dew which on the tender grass
The evening had distill'd.
Drayton.

The roof [of the grotto] is vaulted, and distills fresh water from every part of it, which fell upon us as fast as the first droppings of a shower.

Addison, Remarks on Italy (ed. Bohn), l. 446.

The drowsy house, dispensers of all good,
O'er the mute city stole with folded wings,
Distilling odours on me as they went To greet their fairer sisters of the East.
Templeton, Gardener's Daughter.

Some inarticulate spirit that strove to distill its secret into the ear.
T. B. Aldrich, Ponkapog to Poughkeepsie, p. 231.

2. To subject to the process of distillation; rectify; purify: as, to distill water.—3. To obtain or extract by the process of distillation: as, to distill brandy from wine; to distill whisky.

To draw any Observations out of them [letters] were as if one went about to distill Cream out of Froth.
Howell, Letters, l. i. 1.

Burke could distill political wisdom out of history, because he had a profound consciousness of the soul that underlies and outlives events.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 271.

4. To use as a basis of distillation; extract the spirit or essence from: as, to distill grain or plants.

Some distill'd Cloves of Gylofre and of Spikenard of Spayne and of others spices, that ben well amellunge.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 51.

5. To dissolve or melt. [Rare.]

Swords by the lightning's subtle force distill'd.
And the cold sheath with running metal fill'd.
Addison.

Distilled blue. See blue.
distillable (dis-til'-a-bl), a. [OF. distillabile, F. distillable, < distiller, distil: see distill and -able.] Capable of being distilled; fit for distillation.

Much of the obtained liquor coming from the distillable concretes.

Boyle, Works, II. 225.

distillate (dis-til'-at), n. [L. distillatus, pp. of distillare, distil: see distill and -ate.] In chem., a fluid distilled and found in the receiver of a distilling apparatus; the product of distillation.

Sufficient air is admitted to burn the distillates, and thus to produce the heat required for the distillation itself.
Science, VI. 525.

distillation (dis-til'-a-shun), n. [ME. distillation, distillation, distillation = D. distillatio = G. Dan. Sw. destillation, < OF. distillation, F. distillation = Pr. distillacio = Sp. destilacion = Pg. destillagão = It. destillazione, distillazione, < L. distillatio (n-), destillatio (n-), a dripping down, distilling, catarrh, < distillare, destillare, pp. distillatus, destillatus, drop down: see distill.] 1. The act of distilling, or of falling in drops; a producing or shedding in drops.

Gayn [against] false envy, thynk on my charite,
My bloods alle spilt by distillation.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 112.

2. The volatilization and subsequent condensation of a liquid by means of an alembic, a still and refrigeratory, or a retort and receiver; the operation of obtaining the spirit, essence, or essential oil of a substance by the evaporation and condensation of the liquid in which it has been macerated; rectification; in the widest sense, the whole process of extracting the essential principle of a substance. The most common method of conducting the process of distillation consists in placing the liquid to be distilled in a boiler of copper or other suitable material, called the still, having a movable head from which proceeds a coiled tube called the worm, which passes through water constantly kept cold. Heat being applied to the still the liquid in it is volatilized, and rises in vapor into the head of the still, whence, passing down the curved tube or worm, it is condensed by the cold water, and makes its exit in a liquid state. The object of distillation is to separate volatile liquids from non-volatile liquids and solid matters, and also, by the operation called fractional distillation (which see, below), to separate from each other volatile liquids which have different boiling-points. The process is used in the arts, in the manufacture of alcohol and spirituous liquors, for preparing essences and essential oils, and for a great variety of other purposes.

I study here the mathematics,
And distillation. B. Jonson, Alchemist, iv. 1.

3. The substance extracted by distilling.

I suffered the pangs of three several deaths; . . . to be stopped in, like a strong distillation, with stinking clothes that fretted in their own grease.

Shak., M. W. of W., III. 5.

4. That which falls in drops, as in nasal catarrh.

It [exercise injudiciously used] breedeth Rheumes, Catarrhs and distillations.

Touche-stone of Complexions, p. 104.

Distillation by descent.—See descent.—Dry or destructive distillation, the destruction of a substance by heat in a closed vessel and the collection of the volatile matters evolved. Thus, illuminating gas is a product of the destructive distillation of coal.—Fractional distillation, an operation for separating two liquids which have different boiling-points. The mixture is distilled in an apparatus which admits of constant observation of the temperature, and the liquids obtained between certain intervals of temperature (five or ten degrees) are collected separately. The more volatile liquid will be found chiefly in the "fractions" first collected; and by repeating the process with the first fraction, this more volatile liquid may be obtained in a state of comparative or absolute purity.

distillatory (dis-til'-a-ti-ri), a. and n. [ME. distillatorio = F. distillatoire = Sp. destilatorio = Pg. distillatorio = It. distillatorio, destillatorio, < ML. distillatorium, < L. distillare, destillare, pp. distillatus, destillatus, distil: see distill.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to distillation; used for distilling: as, distillatory vessels.

Having in well closed distillatory glasses caught the fumes driven over by heat.
Boyle, Works, l. 136.

2. n.; pl. distillatories (-is). An apparatus used in distillation; a still.

Thanne muste go do make in the furnes of aischin, a distillatorie of glas al hool of oo pece.

Book of Quete Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 4.

distiller (dis-til'-er), n. One who or that which distills; one whose occupation is to extract spirit by distillation.—Distillers' Company, one of the livery companies of London, which has no hall, but transacts its business at Guildhall.

distillery (dis-til'-er-i), n.; pl. distilleries (-ies). [F. distillerie, a distillery, < distiller, distil: see distill.] 1. The act or art of distilling. [Rare.]—2. The building and works where distilling is carried on.

The site is now occupied by a distillery, and several other buildings.
Pennant, London, p. 41.

distillery-fed (dis-til'-er-i-fed), a. Fed with grain or swill from distilleries, as cattle or hogs.

distillment, distillment (dis-til'-ment), n. [OF. distillement, < distiller: see distill and -ment.] That which is produced by distillation. [Rare.]

In the porches of mine ears did pour
The leperous distillment.
Shak., Hamlet, l. 5.

distinct (dis-tink't), a. [ME. distinct, < OF. distinct, F. distinct = Sp. it. distinto = Pg. distincto = G. distinct = Sw. Dan. distinkt, < L. distinctus, pp. of distingere, distinguish: see distinguish.] 1. Distinguished; not identical; not the same; separate; specifically, marked off; discretely different from another or others, or from one another.

To offend and judge are distinct offices.
Shak., M. of V., II. 2.

The intention was that the two armies which marched out together should afterward be distinct.

Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

Not more distinct from harmony divine,
The constant creaking of a country sign.

Cowper, Conversation, l. 9.

Distinct as the billows, yet one as the sea.

Montgomery, Ocean, l. 54.

2. Clearly distinguishable by sense; that may be plainly perceived; well defined; not blurred or indeterminate: as, a distinct view of an object; distinct articulation; to make a distinct mark or impression.

And the clear voice, symphonious yet distinct.
Cowper, The Task, IV. 162.

Dark-blue the deep sphere overhead, Distinct with vivid stars inlaid.

Templeton, Arabian Nights.

It is not difficult to understand a character which is as plain, the features so distinct and strongly marked.

Theodore Parker, Washington.

3. Clearly distinguishable by the mind; unmistakable; indubitable; positive: as, a distinct assertion, promise, or falsehood.

He [Chambrill] . . . commits an act, not only of private treachery, but of distinct military desertion.

Mason, Hallam's Const. Hist.

4. Very plain and intelligible in thought or expression. The distinction made by writers on vision between imperfection of vision due to want of light (obscurity) and that owing to distance (confusion) was transferred to psychology by Descartes. With him a distinct idea is one which resists dialectic criticism. Later writers, adhering more closely to the optical metaphor, make a clear idea to be one distinguishable from others, and a distinct idea to be one whose parts can be distinguished from one another; hence, one which can be abstractly defined.

While things yet
Are in confusion, give us, if thou canst,
Eye-witness of what first or last was done, Relation more particular and distinct.
Milton, S. A., l. 1286.

The most laudable languages are always most plain and distinct, and the barbarous most confused and indistinct.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 61.

A distinct idea is that wherein the mind perceives a difference from all other.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xix. 4.

5. Distinguishing clearly; capable of receiving or characterized by definite impressions; not confused or obscure: as, distinct visions; distinct perception of right and wrong.

The straight line extending directly in front of each eye, upon which alone objects are distinctly perceived, is called the "line of distinct vision."
Amer. Opt., XVI. 261.

6. Decorated; adorned. [A rare Latinism.]

Diverse flowers distinct with rare delight.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. III. 22.

Nor less on either side tempestuous fell
His arrows, from the fourfold-viaged Four, Distinct with eyes, and from the living wheels Distinct alike with multitude of eyes.
Milton, P. L., VI. 562.

Distinct antennæ, those antennæ which are not contiguous at the base.—Distinct cauda, or tail, a tail separated from the abdomen by a constriction or narrow joint, as in the scorpion.—Distinct scutellum, a scutellum separated by a suture from the pronotum.—Distinct spots, striae, punctures, etc., those spots, striae, etc., which do not touch one another, but are separated by narrow spaces = sp. 1. Separata, etc. See different.—2. a. Well marked, plain, obvious, unmistakable. See distinctly, distinctly (dis-tink't), v. t. [ME. distinct, < OF. distincter, destincter, destincter, destincter, distinguish, < distinct, distinct: see distinct, a.] To make distinct; distinguish.

There can no wight distincte it so That he dare saye a worde thereto.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 6199.

Clerks that were confemours coupled hem togeders, Forthe construe this clause and distinkte hit after.
Piers Plowman (A), IV. 122.

We have, by adding some word to both in English and Latin, Distincted and expounded the same.

Levin, Manip. Vocab., Pref., p. v.

distinctly (dis-tink'ti-ly), v. t.; pret. and pp. distinctlyed, pp. distinctlying. [distinctly = dis-tink'ti-ly, make.] To make distinct. Davies. [Rare.] distinctio (dis-tink't-shi-ō), n. [L. distinctio, separation, comma: see distinction.] In Gregorian music: (a) The pause or break by which melodies are divided into convenient phrases. In a verse of a psalm there are usually three such breaks: as,

Domine | libera animam meam | a labijs iniquis | et a lingua dolosa.
Ps. cxx. 2 (Vulgate).

(b) Same as differentia.

Number is distinction of person be one and moe; and soe is singular and plural.

A. Hume, Orthographie (E. E. T. S.), p. 27.

Standards and confusions twist van and rear Stream in the air, and for distinction serve
Of hierarchies, of orders, and degrees.
Milton, P. L., v. 500.

The distinction which is sometimes made between civil privileges and political power is a distinction without a difference.

Mason, Disabilities of Jews.

Men do indeed speak of civil and religious liberty as different things; but the distinction is quite arbitrary.

II. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 222.

2. A note or mark of difference; a distinguishing quality or character; a characteristic difference: followed by between.

I had from my youth studied the distinctions between religious and civil rights. Milton, Second Defence.

Ev'n Palmyra no distinction found Between the night and day; such darkness reign'd around.
Dryden, Aeneid, iii.

If he does really think that there is no distinction between virtue and vice, why, sir, when he leaves our houses, let us count our spoons.
Johnson, in Boswell, an. 1703.

3. Difference in general; the state or fact of not being the same.

God . . . having set them [simple ideas] as marks of distinction in things, whereby we may be able to discern one thing from another.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxii. 14.

There are distinctions that will live in heaven,
When time is a forgotten circumstance! N. P. Willis.

4. Distinctness.

There is no greater difference betwixt a clull and brash viterance than clear distinction of voices.

Patterson, Art of Eug. Poese, p. 61.

5. The power of distinguishing differences; discrimination; discernment; judgment.

She [Nature] left the eye distinction, to cull out
The one from the other.

Fletcher and Rowley, Maid in the Mill.

Yet take heed, worthy Maximus; all ears Hear not with that distinction mine do.

Fletcher, Valentinian, i. 3.

6. The state of being distinguished; eminence; superiority; elevation of character or of rank in society; the manifestation of superiority in conduct, appearance, or otherwise.

All the Houses of Persons of Distinction are built with Porte-cochères: that is, wide Gates to drive in a Coach.

Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 8.

When there is fully recognized the truth that moral beauty is higher than intellectual power—when the wish to be admired is in large measure replaced by the wish to be loved—that strife for distinction which the present phase of civilization shows us will be greatly moderated.

H. Spencer, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 494.

He was a charming fellow, clever, urbane, free-handed, and with that fortunate quality in his appearance which is known as distinction.

H. James, Jr., Confidence, ii.

7. That which confers or marks eminence or superiority; office, rank, or favor.

To be a really great historian is perhaps the rarest of intellectual distinctions.

Macaulay, History.

8. The act of distinguishing or treating with honor.

The distinctions lately paid us by our betters awaked that pride which I had laid asleep but not removed.

Goldsmith, Vicar, x.

Socinus received him with great marks of distinction and kindness. He decorated him with a chain and bracelets of gold, and gave him a dagger of exquisite workmanship, mounted with the same metal.

Bruce, Source of the Nile, II. 300.

Accidental distinction, discursive distinction, etc. See the adjectives.—Without distinction, indiscriminately.

Maida, women, wives, without distinction, fall. Dryden.
—Syn. Distinctness, Distinction. Distinction has kept the narrower literal sense of the state or quality of being distinct; distinction has been extended to more active meanings, as the mark of difference, the quality distinguishing, superiority by difference, outward rank, honors rendered to one as superior, etc.

And so, in grateful interchange
Of teacher and of hearer,
Their lives their true distinctness keep While daily drawing nearer.

Whittier, Among the Hills.

Pomponius preferred the honour of becoming an Athenian, by intellectual naturalization, to all the distinctions which were to be acquired in the political contests of Rome.

Macaulay, History.

To William Penn belongs the distinction, destined to brighten as men advance in virtue, of first in human history establishing the Law of Love, as a rule of conduct, in the intercourse of nations.

Sumner, Orations, I. 114.

9. Diversity, etc. See difference.—7. Rank, note, reputation, fame, renown, celebrity.

distinctional (dis-tink' shn-gl), a. [< distinction + -al.] Serving for distinction, as of species or groups: as, distinctional characters; distinctional colors. [Rare.]

distinctive (dis-tink'tiv), a. [= F. distinctif = Sp. distintivo = Pg. distintivo = It. distintivo, < L. as if **distinctivus*, < distinctus, pp. of distingere, distingere; see distinct.] 1. Marking distinction, difference, or peculiarity; distinguishing from something diverse; characteristic: as, distinctive names or titles; the distinctive characteristics of a species.

All the distinctive doctrines of the Puritan theology were fully and even coarsely set forth.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

Nearly all cities have their own distinctive colour. That of Venice is a pearly white, . . . and that of Florence is a sober brown.

J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 172, note.

I doubt greatly whether Washington or any other of the leaders of your War of Independence ever used the word "English" as the distinctive name of those against whom they acted. So far as I have seen, the name that was then used in that sense was "British."

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 54.

2. Having the power to distinguish and discern; discerning. [Rare.]

Credulous and vulgar auditors readily believe it, and the more judicious and distinctive heads do not reject it.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

distinctively (dis-tink'tiv-li), adv. In a distinctive manner; with distinction from or opposition (expressed or implied) to something else; peculiarly; characteristically: as, he was by this fact separated distinctively from all the others; this work is distinctively literary. —Syn. Distinctly, Distinctly. The former emphasizes merely the fact of separation or distinction from other things by some peculiarity or specific difference; the latter emphasizes more especially the definiteness and clearness with which this separation or distinction exists or is perceived. Thus, distinctively literary work is peculiarly, or clearly and obviously, literary, as distinguished from other kinds of writing.

And if Greece was distinctively the cultured nation of antiquity, Germany may claim that distinction in modern Europe.

H. N. Ozonham, Short Studies, p. 253.

To what end also doth he distinctly assign a peculiar dispensation of operations to the father, of ministries to the son, of gifts to the Holy Ghost? Barrow, Works, II. xiv.

distinctiveness (dis-tink'tiv-ness), n. The state or quality of being distinctive; distinctive character; individuality.

But the effort to add any other qualities to this refreshing one instantly takes away the distinctiveness, and therefore the exact character to be enjoyed in its appeal to a particular humour in us.

distinctly (dis-tink'tli), adv. 1. In a distinct manner; with distinctness; not confusedly, unclearly, or obscurely; so as not to be confounded with anything else; without the blending of one part or thing with another: as, a proposition distinctly understood; a figure distinctly defined.

Pronounce thy speech distinctly, see thou mark well thy words.

When all were plac'd in seats distinctly known,
And he their father had assum'd the throne,
Upon his ivory scepter first he leant.

Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., i. 220.

Hence—2. Without doubt; obviously; evidently; incontrovertibly.

To despair of what a conscientious collection and study of facts may lead to, and to declare any problem insoluble, because difficult and far off, is distinctly to be on the wrong side in science.

Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 470.

3. Separately; in different places.

Sometime I'd divide
And burn in many places; on the topmast,
The yards and bowprit, would I flame distinctly,
Then meet and join.

Shak., Tempest, i. 2.

—Syn. 1. Distinctly, Clearly, explicitly, definitely, precisely, unmistakably. The first two are sometimes distinguished thus: I see it clearly—that is, fully outlined from all other objects; I see it distinctly—that is, with its features separate to the eye. This, however, is a rather uncommon refinement of meaning. See distinctively.

distinctness (dis-tink'tness), n. The quality or state of being distinct, in any sense of that word.

Whenever we try to recall a scene we saw but for a moment, there are always a few traits that recur, the rest being blurred and vague, instead of the whole being revived in equal distinctness or indistinctness.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 61.

Extensive distinctness. See extensive. —Syn. Distinctness, Distinction (see distinction), plainness, perspicuity, explicitness, lucidity.

distinction (dis-tink'tor), n. [< L.L. distinctior, < L. distinguere, distinguish; see distinct, distinguish.] One who distinguishes or makes distinctions.

Distoma (dis-tō-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. diros, two-mouthed, < di-, two, + ros, mouth.] 1. The typical and leading genus of the family Distomidae; a genus of trematode or suckling parasitic worms, or flukes, of which D. hepaticum, the liver-fluke, is the best-known. D. hepaticum is often found in the liver of sheep, in which it causes the disease called rot, but it also occurs in man and various other animals. In form it is ovate, flattened, and presents two suckers (whence the name), of which the anterior is perforated by the oral aperture, and the posterior median one is approximated to it; there is a complicated branched water-vascular system; the intestine is branched and without an anus. It has been shown that the ciliated embryo passes into Limnaea truncatula, and there gives rise to a sporocyst which develops rediae, which produce other rediae, or cercariae, which are tadpole-like larvae; these after swimming for a time become encysted, as, for example, on blades of grass, and in this state are eaten by sheep. Numerous species of the genus are described. D. hammondi, from the veins of man, is now referred to the genus Bitharbia. See cut under cercaria.

2. [L. a.] An animal belonging to this genus.

The developmental stages of Distoma militare may be summed up as: (1) Ciliated larva, (2) Redia, (3) Cercaria, (4) Cercaria, tailless and encysted, or Incomplete Distoma, (5) Perfect Distoma. Huey, Anat. Invert., p. 181.

3. Same as Distomus, 1. Savigny, 1816.

Distomus (dis-tō-mō-s), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. diros, two-mouthed; see Distoma.] A superfamily group of trematode worms or flukes. They have at most two suckers and no hooks. They develop by a complicated alternation of generations, the larval and asexual forms chiefly inhabiting mollusks, while the sexually mature individuals live mostly in the alimentary canal of vertebrates or its appendages. The group includes the families Distomidae and Monostomidae.

Dimorphic forms are found in certain species of the genera Monostomum and Distomus; . . . one individual develops only male sexual organs, the other only female. Such Distomes are morphologically hermaphrodites, but practically of separate sexes.

Olaus, Zoology (trans.), I. 281.

Distomes (dis-tō-mā-s), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. diros, two-mouthed; see Distoma.] Same as Distoma, regarded as one of two orders of Trematoda, comprising those flukes which have two suckers or only one: distinguished from Polystomes.

Distomidæ (dis-tō-mī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Distoma + -idæ.] A family of digenous trematoid worms or flukes, having two suckers without hooks, as the liver-flukes. The suckers are approximated at one end of the body; reproduction is by an alternation of generations. The principal genera are Distoma and Bitharbia. See cut under cercaria.

Distomum (dis-tō-mum), n. Same as Distoma.

Distomus (dis-tō-mus), n. [NL.: see Distoma.] 1. A genus of ascidians, of the family Botryllidae, with six-rayed anal and branchial orifices. Also Distoma.—2. A genus of Coleoptera. Stephens, 1827.

distort (dis-tōrt'), v. t. [L. distortus, pp. of distorque (> It. distorcere, storcere, twist, untwist, = Sp. destorcer = Pg. destorcer, untwist, = OF. destordre, desteurire, detordre, deturtre, F. distordre, distort), twist different ways, distort, < dis-, apart, + torquere, twist: see tort, torsion, and cf. contort, detort, extort, etc.] 1. To twist or wrest out of shape; alter the shape of; change from the proper to an improper or unnatural shape; represent by an image having a shape somewhat different from nature. At last this odious offspring whom thou seest, Thine own begotten, breaking violent way, Tore through my entrails, that, with fear and pain Distorted, all my nether shape thus grew Transform'd. Milton, P. L., II. 784.

Looking along a hot poker or the boiler of a steamboat, we see objects beyond distorted: 1. a., we no longer see each point in its true direction. P. G. Tait, Encyc. Brit., XIV. 583.

The low light flung a queer, distorted shadow of him on the wall. T. Winthrop, Cecil Dreeme, x.

Shak., A. and C., III. 7.
—Syn. 6. Derangement, aberration of mind, delirium, mania.

distractio (dis-trakt'ahus), a. [< distractio + -ous.] Distractive.

Without such a nature, it would render his providence, to human apprehension, laborious and *distractio*ns.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, Prof.

distractive (dis-trakt'iv), a. [< distract + -ive.] Causing perplexity: as, distractive cares. Dryden.

distractively (dis-trakt'iv-ly), adv. In a distracting or perplexing manner. Carlyle.

distrain (dis-trān'), v. [< ME. distreynen, distreynen, distreynen, < OF. distraindre, distraindre, distraindre, compel, constrain, restrain, = Pr. destrenger, destrenger = It. distingere, distingere, < L. distingere, pp. distinctus, pull asunder, stretch out, engage, hinder, molest, ML. also compel, coerce, as by exacting a pledge by a fine or by imprisonment, < distrahere, < L. distrahere, draw tight, strain: see strain, strict, stringent, etc., and cf. constrain, restrain. See also distriet, distringas, distress.] 1. trans. 1. To pull or tear asunder; rend apart.

That same net so cunningly was wound,
That neither guile nor force might it distrain.

Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 82.

2. To press with force; bear with force upon; constrain; compel.

The genly faucon that with his feet distraineth
The kyngis hand.

Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 337.

Distreyn here herte as faste to retorne,
As thou dost myn to lenger here to se.

Chaucer, Troilus, v. 560.

3. To restrain; bind; confine.

Distrained with chayne. Chaucer, Boethius, II. prose 6.

4. To distress; torment; afflict.

Palamon, that love distraineth so,
That wood out of his wit he goth for wo.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 507.

Much he were distrained in thought,
And . . . for the dede sigh'd full oft there.

Rom. of Parthenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 614.

Some secret sorrow did her heart distraine.

Spenser, F. Q., I. vii. 23.

5. To gain or take possession of; seize; secure.

The proverb saith, he that to much embraceth distraineth himself.

Testament of Love.

Here's Beaufort, that regards nor God nor king, Hath here distrain'd the Tower to his use.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., I. 3.

6. In law: (a) To take and withhold (another's chattel), in order to apply it in satisfaction of the distrainer's demand against him, or to hold it until he renders satisfaction. The right to distrain was recognized as common law as a private remedy in the nature of a reprisal, by which a person might take the personal property of another into his possession, and hold it as a pledge or security until satisfaction was made, as by the payment of a debt, the discharge of some duty, or reparation for an injury done, with the right in certain cases to sell it to obtain satisfaction—as in the instance of the impounding of cattle, damage feasant, or the taking by the landlord of the goods and chattels of a tenant while still upon the premises, for the non-payment of rent.

If any member, of his froward disposition or otherwise, refuse to pay quartermage, penalties, arrears, or other amercements, the master and wardens, with their officers, shall have power at lawful times to enter such member's shop, and distrain the same.

Quoted in English Glode (E. E. T. S.), Int., p. cxxvii., note. They thought it lawfull, and made it a use to distrayne one anothers goodes for small debts.

The plaintiff in the action was the owner of the distrained cattle, and the defendant was the distrainer.

Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 265.

(b) To seize and hold in satisfaction of a demand or claim, or in order to compel the performance of an obligation; seize under judicial process or authority: said of any movable property, or of goods and chattels. See distringas and distress.

II. trans. To make seizure of goods in satisfaction of a claim, or in order to compel the performance of an obligation.

The earl answered, I will not lend money to my superior, upon whom I cannot distrain for the debt.

Camden, Remains.

For neglecting to do suit to the lord's court, or other certain personal service, the lord may distrain of common right.

Blackstone, Com., III. 1.

Unless the complainant who sought to distrain went through all the acts and words required by the law with the most rigorous accuracy, he in his turn . . . incurred a variety of penalties.

Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 272.

distrainable (dis-trān'ā-ble), a. [< OF. distreignable, distreignable, < distraindre, distraindre; see distrain and -able.] Liable to be distrained, or seized in satisfaction of a claim, or in order to compel the performance of some obligation.

Instead therefore of mentioning those things which are distrainable, it will be easier to recount those which are not so, with the reason of their particular exemption.

Blackstone, Com., III. 1.

distrainer, distrainor (dis-trā'nēr, -nōr), n. [< OF. (AF.) distreignor, < distreindre, distrain; see distrain.] One who distrains or seizes goods for debt or service; one who makes or causes seizure by way of distress.

The distrainer has no other power than to retain them [chattels which have been seized] till satisfaction is made.

Blackstone, Com., III. 1.

The Sheriff first of all demanded a view of the impounded cattle; if this was refused, he treated the distrainer as having committed a violent breach of the King's peace.

Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 264.

distrainment (dis-trān'mēt), n. The act of distraining, or the state of being distrained.

distrainor, n. See distrainer.

distrain (dis-trān'), v. [< OF. distreindre, distreindre, distreindre, restrain, < distraindre, distraindre; see distrain.] In law, the act of distraining; a distress.

The distrain of cattle for damage still retains a variety of archaic features. It is not a complete remedy. The taker merely keeps the cattle until satisfaction is made to him for the injury, or till they are returned by him on an engagement to contest the right to distrain in an action of Replevin.

Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 262.

distract (dis-trakt'), v. [F., = E. distract, distract, < L. distrahere; see distract.] 1. Abstracted; absent-minded; inattentive.

And then she got Grace supper, and tried to make her talk; but she was distract, reserved.

Kingsley, Two Years Ago, xvi.

2. In French law, awarded to another. See distractio, 2.

distract, a. See distract. Chaucer.

distract (dis-trakt'), p. a. [< ME. distraught, distraught, another form of distract, distraught, etc.: see distract, a.] 1. Drawn apart; separated.

She sent an arrow forth with mighty draught, . . .
And, in his nape arriving, through it thrild
His greedy throte, therewith in two distract.

Spenser, F. Q., IV. vii. 31.

2. Distracted; bewildered; perplexed; being in or manifesting a state of distraction.

Distracts in thought, reforms him to reason.
Lydgate, Minor Poems, p. 204.

To doubt betwixt our senses and our souls
Which are the most distract and full of pain.

Mrs. Browning.

His aspect was so dazed and distract as to suggest the suspicion that the sherry had been exceptionally potent.

J. Hawthorne, Dusk, p. 165.

distracted, a. [< distraught + -ed.] Distracted.

My weak distracted mynd.

Spenser, Heavenly Beauty.

distract (dis-trakt'), v. t. [< L. dis- + E. stream.] To flow out or over.

Yet o'er that virtuous blush distracts a tear.

distress (dis-tres'), v. t. [< ME. distressen, distressen, < OF. distresser, distresser, distresser, distresser, restrain, constrain, put in straits, afflict, distress, < ML. as if "districare, an assumed freq. form of L. distingere, pp. distinctus, pull asunder, stretch out, ML. compel, coerce, distress: see distrain and district. Hence (in part), by aphesis, stress, v., g. v.] 1. To constrain or compel by pain, suffering, or force of circumstances.

Though the distress of futurity is a strange error, yet it is an error into which led men may naturally be distressed. For it is impossible to bid defiance to final ruin without some refuge in imagination, some presumption of escape.

Young, Night Thoughts, vii., Pref.

Men who can neither be distressed or won into a sacrifice of duty.

Hamilton.

Muley Abul Hassan now abandoned all hope of carrying the place by assault, and attempted to distress it into terms by turning the channel of the river which runs by its walls.

Irving, Granada, p. 44.

2. To afflict with pain, physical or mental; oppress or crush with suffering, misfortune, or calamity; make miserable.

When the kyngs Belymans com to the battell as was grete neede to the kyngs Brangore, and to the kyngs Candor, for they were so distressed that they were even at sight.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), II. 248.

We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed.

1 Cor. iv. 8.

What in their tempers tamed us or distressed
Is, with our anger and the dead, at rest.

Crabbe, Works, II. 25.

distributional (dis-tri-bū'shən-al), a. [< distribution + -al.] Of or pertaining to distribution; specifically, in zoogeog., of or pertaining to the geographical distribution of animals; chorological.

The orang has the smallest distributional area, being confined to the islands of Borneo and Sumatra.

Huxley, Anim. Vert., p. 403.

distributionist (dis-trib'ū-shon-ist), n. [< distribution + -ist.] One who advocates or promotes distribution; a believer in distribution. [Rare.]

The distributionists trembled, for their popularity was at stake. . . . The popularity of the distribution society among the ladies of our parish is unprecedented.

Dickens, Sketches, Ladies' Societies.

distributival (dis-trib'ū-tiv'al or dis-trib'ū-tiv'al), a. [< distributive, n., + -al.] In gram., of or pertaining to a distributive; of the nature of a distributive.

distributive (dis-trib'ū-tiv), a. and n. [= F. distributif = Pr. distributiu = Sp. Pg. It. distributivo, < L. distributivus (in grammatical sense), < L. distributus, pp. of distribuere, distribute; see distribute.] 1. a. 1. That distributes; dividing and assigning in portions; dealing to each his proper share.

The other part of justice is commonly called distributive, and is commanded in this rule, "Render to all their dues."

Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, III, Pref.

The plain foundations of a distributive justice, and due order in this world, may lead us to conceive a further building.

Shaftesbury, in Fowler's Shaftesbury and [Hutcheson, p. 111.]

Specifically—2. In logic, showing that a statement refers to each individual of a class separately, and not to these individuals as making up the whole class. The distributive acceptance of such an adjective as all is that in which whatever is said of all is said of each; opposed to collective acceptance, in which something is said of the whole which is not true of the parts. Thus, in the sentence "All the planets are seven," the all is collective; in the sentence "All the planets revolve round the sun," it is distributive.

3. Expressing separation or division: as, a distributive prefix; specifically, in gram., used to denote the persons or things that constitute a pair or number, as considered separately and singly: as, a distributive pronoun; a distributive numeral. The distributive pronouns in English are each, every, either, neither. The distributive numerals in Latin are singuli, uno by one, each; bini, by two, two each; terni, three each, etc.

4. In math., operating upon every part in operating upon the whole.—Distributive finding of the issue, in law, an issue found by a jury which is in part for the plaintiff and in part for the defendant.—Distributive formula, in math., a formula which expresses that two operations, as F and g, are so related that, for all values of x, y, z, etc., we have

In a more general sense, every formula which expresses that the operations F, g, are so related that in every case  $F \circ (x, y) = g \circ (x, y)$ .—Distributive function, in math., a function such that  $f(x + y) = fx + fy$ .—Distributive operation, in math., an operation subject to a distributive formula.—Distributive principle, in math., a rule expressed by a distributive formula.

II. n. In gram., a word that divides or distributes, as each and every, which represent the individuals of a collective number as separate.

distributively (dis-trib'ū-tiv-ly), adv. By distribution; singly; not collectively; in a distributive sense.

When an universal term is taken distributively, sometimes it includes all the individuals contained in its inferior species: as when I say, every sickness has a tendency to death, I mean every individual sickness, as well as every kind.

Watts, Logic, II, 2.

Distributively satisfied composite relation, one of which no factor is wholly unsatisfied.

distributiveness (dis-trib'ū-tiv-ness), n. 1. Desire of distributing; generosity. [Rare.]

A natural distributiveness of humour, and a desire to be employed in the relief of every kind of want of every person.

Dr. Fell, Hammond, § 2.

2. In math., the fact of operating upon every part in operating upon the whole; the being subject to a distributive formula.

distributor (dis-trib'ū-tor), n. [< OF. distribuour, distribueur = F. distributeur = Pr. Sp. Pg. distribuidor = It. distributore, distributore, < L. distributor, < L. distribuere, distribute; see distribute.] Same as distributer.

The suppression of unnecessary distributors and other parasites of industry.

J. E. Mill, Socialism.

district (dis'trikt), n. [< F. district = Sp. distrito = Pg. distrito = It. distretto, distrito = D. distrikt = G. district = Dan. Sw. distrikt, < ML. districtus, a district within which the lord may detain, also jurisdiction, < L. districtus, pp. of distingere, draw asunder, compel, detain; see distrain.] 1. A limited extent of country marked off for a special purpose, administrative, political, etc.; a street or territory within which may be exercised or to which are limited certain rights or powers; any portion of land or country, or any part of a city or town, which is defined by law or agreement. In British India and in various European countries a district is a subdivision of a province. In reference to political divisions in the United States, it generally imports that the inhabitants act together for some one specific purpose: as, a highway district; a school district; an election district (as a senate, assembly, or congressional district). In some States the term is applied to a class of towns. In South Carolina, during most of the period from 1708 to 1868, the chief subdivision of the State (excepting the coast region) was called a district, instead of a county as in the other States. In Virginia and West Virginia the chief subdivision of a county is called a municipal district, with reference to the organization of local justice. In Tennessee it is called a city district; in Kentucky, a justice's district; in Georgia, a justice district; in Maryland, an election district. In other States these divisions are called towns or townships. In colonial and provincial Massachusetts the district was a part set off from a town and made independent of it in respect to local administration, but not in respect to choosing a representative to the General Court. In the Methodist Episcopal Church the district is a territorial subdivision of a conference, comprising a number of churches and societies, under the charge of a presiding elder. A military district of a country is a division of a military territorial department. The federal territory containing the national capital is called the District of Columbia. Abbreviated dist.

Even the decrees of general councils bind not but as they are accepted by the several churches in their respective districts and dioceses, of which I am to give an account in the following periods. Jer. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, I, II, § 1.

2. A region in general; a territory within definite or indefinite limits: as, the district of the earth which lies between the tropics, or that which is north of a polar circle; the districts of Russia covered by forest.—District attorney, an officer appointed to act as attorney for the people or government within a specified district.—District conference. See conference, 2.—District court, a court of limited jurisdiction having cognizance of causes within a district defined by law.—District court martial. See court martial, under court.—District school, a public or free school for the inhabitants of a specified district.—Metropolitan district, a title used in a few instances (as in the territory collectively known as London, in England, with its suburbs) for a division of country, including a chief city, defined by statute for the purposes of government and municipal regulation, such as for supervision in respect to fire, health, police, etc.—Mining district, a settlement of miners organized after the plan which, in the first years of mining in the westernmost part of the United States, the miners, in independence of all other authority, derived for their own self-government.—Parish district, in England, a division of a parish for general ecclesiastical purposes.—Taxing district, in the United States, the territory or region into which (for the purpose of assessment merely) a State, county, town, or other political district is divided. H. H. Emerson.—United States district courts, the lowest courts of the federal judicial system, having jurisdiction chiefly in admiralty, bankruptcy, and criminal matters.—Syn. Division, quarter, locality, province, tract.

district (dis'trikt), v. t. [< district, n.] To divide into districts or limited portions of territory: as, in the United States, States are districted for the choice of certain officers; counties or towns are districted for the maintenance of schools, etc.

district (dis'trikt), a. [< L. districtus, pp. of distingere, draw asunder, stretch tight; see distrain, and district, n.] Stringent; rigorous; strict.

They should not enforce nor compel the citizens . . . to more difficult or district proofs of their Articles of complaints.

Habington's Voyages, I, 105.

Punishing with the rod of district severity.

Poss, Martyrs, p. 782.

districtly (dis'trikt-ly), adv. In a stringent manner; stringently; rigorously.

We send our mandates againe unto your brotherhood, in these apostolical writings, districtly and in virtue of obedience commanding you. Quoted in Poss's Martyrs, p. 518.

distrist, n. [ME., appar. irreg. < dist + strife.] Strife; contention.

For he wolde not have in no wise distrist betwene hem two.

Morin (E. E. T. S.), III, 332.

distringas (dis-tring'gas), n. [Law L., 2d pers. sing. subj. pres., with impv. meaning, of ML. distingere, distrain; see distrain.] In law: (a) A process, now little used, directing the sheriff to distrain or make distress—that is, to seize and withhold the goods of the person sought to be coerced. It was used to compel a defendant to appear; also, after judgment for plaintiff in an action of detinue, to compel the defendant, by repeated distresses of his goods, to give up the chattel detained. (b) A process commanding the sheriff to bring in the bodies of jurors who did not appear, or to distrain their lands and goods. (c) A process in equity against a body corporate refusing to obey the summons and direction of the court. (d) An order of chancery, in favor of a party claiming to be interested in any stock in the Bank of England, by which a notice is served on the bank directing its officers not to permit its transfer, or not to pay any dividend on it.

distrix (dis'triks), n. [NL., appar. irreg. < Gr. dix, di-, two-, + dixis (dixis), hair.] Forky hair; a disease of the hair in which it splits at the end. Thomas, Med. Dict.

distroublat (dis-trub'l), v. t. [< ME. distroublen, distroublen, destroublen, also distourblen, distroublen, trouble, disturb, < *OF. *destourbler* (cf. destourbier, desturbier, destoublir, trouble, vexation, = Pr. desturbelhar, var. of destourbier, destorbier, desturbier, equiv. to destourber, destorber, desturber, > ME. destourben, disturben, disturb, trouble, after OF. tourbler, troubler, trubler, > ME. troublen, trouble; see disturb and trouble.] To disturb; trouble greatly.

Mychel they [netles, thorns, etc.] distroubled me, For sore I drad to harmed be. Rom. of the Rose, l. 1718.

That was a thyng that gretly hem distroubled in her armyng, and they-yne thei caught grete damage.

Morin (E. E. T. S.), II, 154.

Her former sorrow into sudden wrath (Both eosen passions of distroubled spright) Converting.

Spenser, F. Q., III, iv, 12.

distroublat, n. [ME., < distrouble, v.] Trouble.

And rode so fro morrowe to euen that no distrouble thei ne hadde till thei com to Roostok.

Morin (E. E. T. S.), III, 345.

distrust (dis-trust'), n. [< dis- + trust, n.] 1. Absence of trust; doubt or suspicion; want of confidence, faith, or reliance: as, to listen with distrust; to look upon a project with distrust.

Therefore to the end that thou shalt not bee in any manner distrust, it is God that is the maker of this promise.

J. Udall, On Luke, I.

So is swearing an affect of distrust, and want of faith or honesty, on one or both sides.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I, 208.

The self-accusations of such a man are to be received with some distrust, not of his sincerity, but of his sober judgment.

Southey, Banyan, p. 13.

Nor does deception lead more surely to distrust of men than self-deception to suspicion of principles.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 151.

2. Discredit; loss of credit or confidence.

To me reproach

Rather belongs, distrust, and all dispraise.

Milton, P. L., xi, 160.

distrust (dis-trust'), v. t. [< dis-priv. + trust, v. Cf. distrust, n.] To withhold trust or confidence from; doubt or suspect; refuse to confide in, rely upon, or give credence to: as, to distrust a man's veracity; I distrust his intentions.

I am ready to distrust mine eyes. Shak., T. N., iv, 3. T' intrinch in what you grant—unrighteous laws, Is to distrust the justice of your cause.

Dryden, Hind and Panther.

distruster (dis-trus'ter), n. One who distrusts.

distrustful (dis-trust'fūl), a. [< distrust + -ful.] 1. Full of distrust; wanting confidence; suspicious; mistrustful.

Milton, Ps. III, 5.

distrustfulness (dis-trust'fūl-ness), n. The state of being distrustful or suspicious; want of confidence.

But notwithstanding, many of them, through too much distrustfulness, departed and prepared to depart with their pockets at the first sight of you.

Habington's Voyages, II, II, 159.

distrustingly (dis-trust'fūl-ly), adv. Suspiciously; with distrust.

distrustless (dis-trust'les), a. [< distrust + -less.] Free from distrust or suspicion; confident.

The same Divine teacher enjoins his Apostles to consider the lilies, or (as some would have it) the tulips of the field, and to learn thence that difficult virtue of a distrustless reliance upon God.

Boyle, Works, II, 25.

distune (dis-tūn'), v. t. [< dis- + tune.] To put out of tune.

For Adams sin, all creatures else account; Their Harmony distuned by his ear.

Spenser, tr. of Du Baras's Weeks, II, The Furies.

disturb (dis-tərb'), v. t. [< ME. disturben, desturban, destourben, < OF. destourber, destorbier, desturbier, also destourbier, disturb, disturb = Fr. Offp. disturber = Sp. Pg. disturb = It. disturbare, disturbare, < L. disturbare, drive asunder, separate by violence, disorder, disturb, < dis-, apart, + turbare, disorder, throw into confusion, trouble: see turbulent, trouble. Cf. disturbance.] 1. To stir; trouble; agitate; molest; move from a state of rest or tranquillity: as, to disturb a sleeper; to disturb the sediment.

If he be at his book, disturb him not.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, I. 1.

2. To move or agitate; discompose; disquiet; throw into perplexity or confusion.

You groan, sir, ever since the morning light,
As something had disturb'd your noble sprite.
Dryden, Cuck and Fox.

We seldom mix long in conversation without meeting with some accident that ruffles and disturbs us.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. x.

I feared my brain was disturbed by my sufferings and misfortunes.
Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iv. 2.

Preparing to disturb
With all-confounding war the realms above.
Cowper, Iliad, xi.

3. To interfere with; interrupt; hinder; incommode; derange.

For which men say may nought disturbed be
That shall bytyden of necessity.

The coin shows a small distyle temple on a rock, flanked by two tall terminal figures, and by two cypress trees.
B. V. Head, Historia Numorum, p. 247.

The favourite arrangement was a group of pillars "distyle in antis," as it is technically termed, viz., two circular pillars between two square piers.
J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 184.

II. n. A portico of two columns.

disulphate (di-sul'fat), n. [dis- + sulphate.] 1. In chem., a sulphate containing a hydrogen atom replaceable by a basic element or radical; an acid sulphate.—2. A sulphate having the general formula  $R_2SO_4$ ; a salt of disulphuric acid: as, potassium disulphate,  $K_2SO_4$ .

disulphid (di-sul'fid), n. [dis- + sulphid.] In chem., a sulphid containing two atoms of sulphur.

disulpho- In chem., in composition, indicating certain acids formed by substituting two radicals having the formula  $SO_2OH$  for two hydrogen atoms in a hydrocarbon.

disulphuric (di-sul'fu'rik), a. [dis- + sulphuric.] Containing two sulphuric-acid radicals. Used only in the following phrase.—Disulphuric acid, an acid,  $H_2SO_4$ , formed in the manufacture of Nordhausen sulphuric acid and separated from it in white crystals. It decomposes easily, but forms stable salts. Also called pyrosulphuric acid.

disuniform (dis-i'n'-form), a. [dis-priv. + uniform.] Not uniform.

disunion (dis-i'n'-yon), n. [F. disunion = Sp. desunion = Pg. desunio = It. disunioni; as dis-priv. + union.] 1. Severance of union; separation; disjunction; rupture.

The royal preacher in my text, assuming that man is a compound of an organized body and an immortal soul, places the formality and essence of death in the disunion and final separation of these two constituent parts.
Bp. Horsley, Works, III. xxxix.

If disunion was out of the question, consolidation was not less repugnant to their feelings and opinions.
J. C. Calhoun, Works, I. 123.

2. A breach of amity; rupture of union in feeling or opinion; contentious disagreement.

That rub, which must prove fatal to Ireland in a short time, and might grow to such a disunion between the two Houses as might much cloud the happiness of this kingdom.
Clarendon, Civil War, I. 227.

disunionist (dis-i'n'-yon-ist), n. [dis- + union + -ist.] An advocate of disunion; specifically, in U. S. hist., one of those who, prior to and during the civil war of 1861-65, favored or sought the disruption of the United States.

It would do for the disunionists that which of all things they most desire—feed them well, and give them disunion without a struggle of their own.
Lancet, in Raymond, p. 142.

The Federalists characterized their opponents . . . as disorganizers, disunionists, and traitors.
H. Adams, Albert Gallatin, II. 102.

disunite (dis-i'n'-it), v.; pret. and pp. disunited, pp. disuniting. [L. disunite, pp. of disunire (= It. disunire = Sp. desunir = OF. desunir, desunier, F. disunir), disjoin, < L. dis-priv. + L. unire, unite: see dis- and unite.] I. trans.

dithyramb, dithyrambus (dith-i-ramb, dith-i-ram'bus), n.; pl. dithyrambi, dithyrambi (-rambz, -ram'bi). [< L. dithyrambus, < Gr. δithyrambos; origin unknown.] A form of Greek lyric composition, originally a choral song in honor of Dionysus, afterward of other gods, heroes, etc. First given artistic form by Arion (about 625 B. C.) and rendered by cyclic choruses. It was perfected, about a century later, by Iambe of Hermione, and at about the same time tragedy was developed from it in Attica. Its simpler and more majestic form, as composed by Lasos, Alcibiades, Bacchylides, and Pindar, assumed in the latter part of the fifth century a complexity of rhythmical and musical form and of verbal expression which degenerated in the fourth century into a mimetic performance rendered by a single artist. From these different stages in its history the word dithyramb has been used in later ages both for a nobly enthusiastic and elevated and for a wild or inflated composition. In its distinctive form the dithyramb is ἀλκιδρόμος (consists of a number of strophes no two of which are metrically identical).

dithyrambic (dith-i-ram'bi), a. and n. [< L. dithyrambius, < Gr. δithyrambius, < δithyrambos, a dithyramb: see dithyramb.] 1. a. 1. In the style of a dithyramb. Hence—2. Intensely lyrical; bacchanalian.

div (div), v.; pret. dived, sometimes dove, pp. dived, ppr. diving. [Early mod. E. also dyve; < ME. diven, dyven, doven, duven (pret. **dyfde*, dyfde), < AS. dyffan (weak verb, pret. dyfde) (= Icel. dyfa), dip, immerse, causal of dýfan (strong verb, pret. dyfði, pl. dyfðu, pp. dyfen; early ME. duven, pret. dyf, dyaf), dive, sink, penetrate (in comp. ge-dýfan, dive, be-dýfan, cover with water, submerge (= OLG. beddōven, be covered with water, LG. bedāven, pp. covered, esp. with water), thurk-dýfan, dive through, etc.). Perhaps ult. connected with dip, q. v. The mod. pret. is prop. dived, but the pret. dove, after the assumed analogy of dove from drive (cf. stroke for earlier strived, pret. of strive), is common in colloquial speech, and is found in good literary use.] I. intrans. 1. To descend or plunge head first into water; thrust the body suddenly into water or other fluid; plunge deeply: as, to div for shells.

Provide me (Lord) of Steers-man, Star, and Boat,
That through the vast Sea I may safely Boat:
Or rather teach me dyve, that I may view Deep vnder water all the Booby crew.

straight into the river Kwanaid Tramped as if he were an otter, Dived (in early editions doze) as if he were a beaver.
Longfellow, Hiawatha, vii.

Hence—2. To make a plunge in any way; plunge suddenly downward or forward, especially so as to disappear: as, to diver down a precipice or into a forest.

She stood for a moment, then dived into the dense fog which had floated in from the river, and disappeared.
G. W. Cable, Old Creole Days, p. 22.

3. To plunge or enter deeply into something that engrosses the attention; engage deeply in anything: as, to diver to the bottom of a subject; to diver into the whirl of business.

How can they pretend to diver into the secrets of the human heart?
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, ivii.

Dived in a board of tales that dealt with knights, Half-legend, half-historic. Tennyson, Princess, Prol.

II. trans. To explore by diving. [Rare.]

The Curtin bravely dived the gulf of fane.
Sir J. Denham.

diver (div'), n. [divo, v.] 1. A descent or plunge head first into water or other fluid; a "header":
 as, a diver from a spring-board.—2. A sudden attack or swoop: as, to make a diver.—3. A disreputable place of resort, where drinking and other forms of vice are indulged in, and, commonly, vulgar entertainments are given: so called because often situated in basements or other half-concealed places into which the resorters may "dive" with little risk of observation. [Colloq.]

There are 150 gambling dives, the approaches to which are generally so barricaded as to defy police detection.
N. A. Rev., CXLIII, 23.

They [the New York police] have been well backed up in closing the more iniquitous dives and disreputable resorts.
Contemporary Rev., LIII, 227.

divedapper, divedopert (div'dap'ér, -dop'- ér), n. [See divapper.] 1. Same as divapper.
Certaine dius-doppers or water-foules.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II, 22.

2. A pert fellow: in contempt.

There's no good fellowship in this landiprat,
 This diver-dapper, as is in other parts.
Middleton, More Dissemblers besides Women, iii, 1.

divel (div'el), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of devil.

divel (div'el'), v. t. [L. dissolvere, pull asunder, rend, < di- for dis-, asunder, + olvere, pull.]
 To pull asunder; rend.

At the first littering, their eyes are fastly closed—that is, by coalition or joining together of the eyelids, and so continue until about the twelfth day: at which time they begin to separate, and may be easily divelled or parted asunder.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii, 27.

divelline (div'el'-in), v. t. An obsolete or dialectal form of devilish.

divellent (div'el'-ent), a. [= F. divellent, < L. divellere (t-s), ppr. of divellere, pull asunder: see divel.] Drawing asunder; separating. [Rare.]

divellitate (div'el'-i-tät), v. t. [L. di- for dis-, asunder, + vellitate, pp. of vellitare, pull, pluck, < vellere, pull. Cf. divel.] To pull in pieces. [Obsolete or rare.]

My brother told me you had used him dishonestly, and had divellitated his character behind his back.
Fielding, Amelia, v, 2.

diver (div'ér), n. [ME. diver, dyver.] 1. One who or that which dives or plunges into water.

The myd dyver dyde all that busynes beyng underneath the water.
Sir R. Gysford, Pilgrimage, p. 72.

The king he call'd his divers all,
 To dive for his young son.
Young Hunting (Child's Ballads, III, 229).

Specifically—(a) One who makes a business of diving, as for pearl-oysters, to examine sunken vessels, etc. See sub- marine diver, under diver. (b) A bird that habitually dives, as a loon, grebe, auk, or penguin; specifically, one or any of the birds usually known as Brachypteryx, Mer- gamus, Uria, Graculus, Puffinus, or Spheniscus. The term is especially applied to the loon, family Columbidae (which see). There are three leading species: the great northern diver, Columba torquatus; the black-throated diver, C. arcticus; and the red-throated diver, C. septen- trionalis. All three inhabit the northern hemisphere generally, and are noted not only for their quickness in diving, but also for the length of time they remain and the distance they traverse under water, in which they move both by swimming with the feet and by paddling with the wings. See loon. Also diving-bird.

2. One who plunges into or engages deeply in anything.—Cartesian diver. See Cartesian.

diver, n. See dyver.

diver (div'ér), n. [L. diverbium, the dialogue of a comedy (an imperfect translation of Gr. diallogos, dialogue), < di- for dis-, apart (or else repr. Gr. dia), + verbum = E. word.
 Cf. proverb.] A saying in which the two members of a sentence are contrasted; an anti-thetical proverb. [Rare.]

England is a paradise for women, a hell for horses; Italy a paradise for horses, a hell for women: as the diver goes.
Burton, Anat. of Mel, p. 207.

diverbatet (di-vér'-bät), v. t. [L. di- verberatus, pp. of diverbarare, strike asunder, cleave, divide, < di-, dis-, asunder, + verbarare, strike, beat, whip: see verbarate, and cf. rever- berate.] To cleave or penetrate through, as sound.

These cries for blameless blood diverbatet
 The high resounding Heav'n's convextile.
Davies, Holy Roode, p. 14.

diverbatum (di-vér'-bi-um), n. [L. di- verbatum, pp. of diverbarare, strike asunder, cleave, divide, strike, beat: see diverbarate, and
 cf. reverberation.] A cleaving or penetrating, as sound.

diverbiu (di-vér'-bi-um), n. [L. diverbia (-g).
[L. see diverb.] In the anc. Rom. drama, any passage declaimed or recited by the actors without musical accompaniment or singing; the dialogue, or a scene in dialogue: opposed to can- tum. The diverbia are generally composed in iambic trimeters (senarii).

diverge (di-vér'), v. t. pret. and pp. diverged, ppr. diverging. [= D. divergere = G. divergen- ren = Dan. divergere = Sw. divergera, < F. di- verger = Sp. divergir = Pg. diverger, divergir = It. divergere, < *ML. *divergere*, < L. di-, dis-, apart, + vergere, incline, verge, tend: see verge, converge.] 1. To move or lie in different directions from a common point; branch off: opposed to converge.

In the catchment-basin all the branches converge to the main stream; in the delta they all diverge from the trunk channel.
Huxley, Physiology, p. 145.

Hence—2. In general, to become or be separated from another, or one from another; take different courses or directions: as, diverging trains of thought; lives that diverge one from the other.

And wider yet in thought and deed
 Diverge our pathways, one in youth.
Whittier, Memories.

3. To differ from a typical form; vary from a normal state or from the truth.—4. In math., to become larger (in modulus) without limit:
 said of an infinite series when, on adding the terms, beginning with the first, the sum increases indefinitely toward infinity. A series may be divergent without diverging. See di- vergent series, under divergent.

divergement (di-vér'-ment), n. [diverge +
 -ment.] The act of diverging. [Rare.]

divergence (di-vér'-jens), n. [Sometimes also divergencis; = G. divergens = Dan. Sw. diver-
divergenza, < *ML. *divergentia*, < divergent (t-s), ppr. of divergere, diverge: see divergent and converge.] 1. The act or state of diverging, or moving or pointing in different directions (not directly opposed) from a common point; a re-ceeding one from another: opposed to conver- gence: as, the divergence of lines.

The nearer the direction of the incident rays to that of the optic axis, the less the divergence between the ordinary and the extraordinary rays.

Double images in sleepiness are certainly due to diver- gence, not convergence, of the optic axis.
Le Comte, Sight, p. 253.

Hence—2. Departure from a course or standard; differentiation in action or character; deviation: as, the divergence of religious sects; divergence from rectitude.

In our texts, it is true, the employment of the case-endings is usually according to their original signification; the number of divergences from this is relatively small.
Amer. Jour. Philol., V, 404.

3. In math., the negative of the scalar part of the result of operating with the Hamiltonian operator upon a vector function. It is so called because if the vector function represents displacements of the parts of a fluid, the divergence represents the decrement of density at any point due to this displacement.—
Angle of divergence. See angle.

divergency (di-vér'-jen-si), n. [As divergence.]
 The state of being divergent, or of having diver- ged. Also rarely divergency.

divergent (di-vér'-jent), a. [= D. divergent, < F. divergent = Sp. Pg. It. divergentis, < *ML. *di-* vergen(t)s, ppr. of divergere, diverge: see di- verge.] 1. Moving or situated in different directions from a common point, as lines which intersect: opposed to convergent.—2. In general, separating or separated one from another;
 following different courses or directions.

There was hardly an expedition, hardly a negotiation, in which bickerings and divergent counsels did not appear.
Lachy, Eng. in 18th Cent., I.

3. Deviating from something taken as a standard or reference; variant.

In England the ideas of the multitude are perilously divergent from those of the thinking class.
J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 120.

Divergent parabola, a name given by Newton to a cubic parabola or cubic curve having the line at infinity as its inflexional tangent.—Divergent rays, rays which, proceeding from a point of a visible object, continually depart from one another in proportion as they receede from the object: opposed to convergent rays. Concave lenses render parallel rays di- vergent, convex lenses con*vergent*.—Divergent series, an infinite series such that, if we begin adding the terms together in their order, we do not ultimately approximate indefinitely toward a finite limit, but either oscillate from one value to another or move toward infinity. Only in the latter case, according to the usage of mathematicians, is a divergent series said to diverge.
 Thus, for instance, the infinite series 1 - 1 + 1 - 1 + 1 - 1 + 1 is divergent without diverging.—Divergent strabismus.
 See strabismus.—Divergent wings, in entom., wings which in repose are horizontal but spread apart, receding from the abdomen, as in many flies.

diverging (di-vér'-jing), p. a. [Ppr. of diverge, div.] Same as divergent.

divergingly (di-vér'-jing-li), adv. In a diverg- ing manner.

divers (di-vér'), a. [ME. divers, dyvers, di- versus, dyvers, < F. divers, F. divers = Pr. di- vers = Sp. Pg. It. diverso, < L. diversus, various, different, also written diversus, pp. of divertere, divert, turn or go different ways, part, separate, divert: see divert. According to modern analogies, the word divers would be written di- versus (pron. di-vér's); association with the F. original favored the spelling divers; and this form, with the plurality involved in the word, caused it to be regarded as a plural (whence the pron. di-vér's). Hence in mod. speech di- vers is used only with a plural noun. It is now obsolete or archaic, the form diverse, regarded as directly from the L., having taken its place.
 In earlier use divers and diverse are merely different spellings of the same word; early quotations are therefore here all put under divers.
 See diverse.] 1. Different in kind, quality, or manner; various.

In Egypt also there ben dyvers Languages and dyvers Lettres, and of other manere condiccion, than there ben in other parties.

Thou shalt not sow thy vineyard with divers seeds.
Deut. xiii, 2.

At what a divers price do divers men
 Act the same things!
E. Johnson, Fall of Mortimer, l. 1.

Thus, like Sampsons Foxes, their heads are divers ways, but they are tied together by the tails.

2. Several; sundry; more than one, but not a great number: as, we have divers examples of this kind.

There be divers fishes that cast their spawn on flags or stones.
J. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 47.

I believe, besides Zoroaster, there were divers that writ before Moses.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, l. 22.

He has divers MSS., but most of them astrological, to what study he is addicted.
 Evelyn, Diary, July 22, 1672.

= Syn. Divers, Diverse. Divers implies difference only, and is always used with a plural noun; diverse (with either a singular or a plural noun) denotes difference with opposition. Thus, the evangelists narrate the same events in divers manners, but not in diverse. Trenck.

diverse (di-vér' or di-vér's), a. [Same as di- vers, but resting more closely on the L. diversus:
 see divers.] 1. Different in kind; essentially different; different as individuals of one kind or as different kinds, but not as being affected by different accidents. Thus, Philip drunk and Philip sober, though different, are not diverse.

Four great boasts came up from the sea, diverse one from another.

The Pilgrims were clothed with such kind of raiment as was diverse from the raiment of any that traded in that Fair.
Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 125.

Woman is not undeveloped man,
 But diverse.
Tennyson, Princess, vii.

Owing to this variety of interchangeable names for the chapeau question, diverse milids were enabled to form the same judgment concerning it.
George Eliot, Middlemarch, I, 201.

2. Capable of assuming many forms; various;
 multiform.

Eloquence is a diverse thing.
E. Johnson.

= Syn. Divers, Diverse. See divers.

diverse (di-vér's'), v. [< ME. diversen, < OF. diverser, make or be diverse, differ, diverge, vary, = Fr. diverser = Pg. diversar, discern, distinguish, = It. diversare, be diverse, < ML. diversare, diverge, turn, vary, < L. diversus, pp. of diversare, turn or go different ways: see divert, diverse, u., divers, a.] I. trans. To make diverse; diversify. Chaucer.

II. intrans. 1. To differ; be diverse.

Iowes, Gentiles, and Saracines iugen homelue That lecliche thei by-leyuen and gut here [their] law dyuermeth. Piers Plowman (C), xviii. 123.

2. To turn aside; turn out of one's way.

The Redcrosse Knight divert, but forth rode Britomart.
Spenser, F. Q., III. iii. 62.

diversely (di-vér's'li or di-vér's'li), adv. [< ME. diversly, diversly, diverseliche; < diversa, diversus, + -ly.] In diverse or different ways or directions; differently; variously. Also formerly diversly.

Wonder it is to see in diverse mindes
How diversly love doth his pageants play.
Spenser, F. Q., III. v. 1.

In the teaching of men diversly temper'd different ways are to be try'd. Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

diversifiable (di-vér's'i-fi-á-bl), a. [= F. diversifiable = Pg. diversificabile; as diversify + -able.] That may be diversified or varied.

The almost infinitely diversifiable contours of all the small parts. Boyle, Works, IV. 281.

diversification (di-vér's'i-fi-ká-shn), n. [= F. diversification = Pg. diversificazione; as diversify + -ation.] 1. The act of changing forms or qualities, or of making various: as, diversification of labor.

There will be small reason to deny these to be true colours, which more manifestly than others disclose themselves to be produced by diversifications of the light.
Boyle, Works, I. 691.

In business, diversification and rivalry should be encouraged rather than stamped out by the iron heel of grasping monopoly. S. Bowles, in Merriam, II. 338.

2. Diversity or variation; change; alteration: as, "diversification of voice." Sir M. Hale.

diversified (di-vér's'i-fid), p. a. [Pp. of diversify, v.] Distinguished by various forms, or by a variety of objects: as, diversified scenery; a diversified landscape; diversified industry.

diversiflorous (di-vér's'i-fló-rus), a. [= F. diversiflore, < NL. diversiflorus, < L. diversus, various, + flos (flor-), > E. flower.] In bot., bearing flowers of two or more sorts.

diversifolious (di-vér's'i-fó-li-us), a. [< NL. diversifolius; < L. diversus, various, + folium, leaf, + -ous.] In bot., having leaves differing in form or color, etc.

diversiform (di-vér's'i-fórm), a. [= F. Sp. diversiforme, < L. diversus, various, + forma, shape.] Of a different form; of various forms.

It [search] produced a marvellous facility for detecting doubtful or imperfect truths, an instinctive recognition of the manifold diversiform phases that every speculative or moral truth must necessarily possess.
J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, I. 305.

diversify (di-vér's'i-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. diversified, ppr. diversifying. [< F. diversifier = Pr. diversificar, diversificar = Sp. Pg. diversificar = It. diversificare, < ML. diversificare, < L. diversus, diverse, + facere, make.] To make diverse or various in form or qualities; give variety or diversity to: as, to diversify the colors of a fabric; mountains, plains, trees, and lakes diversify the landscape; to diversify labor.

It was much easier . . . for Homer to find proper sentiments for an assembly of Grecian generals than for Milton to diversify his infernal council with proper characters.
Addison, Spectator, No. 279.

This soul of ours . . .
Doth use, on divers objects, divers powers;
And so are her effects diversify'd.
Sir J. Davies, Immortal of Soul, xi.

diversiloquent (di-vér's'i-ló-kwnt), a. [< L. diversus, different, + loquens (-t-), ppr. of loqui, speak.] Speaking in different ways. Craig. [Rare.]

diversion (di-vér'sh-n), n. [= G. Dan. Sw. diversion, < F. diversion = Sp. diversion = Pg. diversion = It. diversione, < ML. diversio(n-), < L. divertere, pp. diversus, divert: see divert.] 1. The act of turning aside from a course; a turning into a different direction or to a different point or destination: as, the diversion of a stream from its usual channel; the diversion of the mind from business or study, or to another object.

Cutting off the tops and pulling off the buds work retention of the sap for a time, and diversion of it to the sprouts that were not forward. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. That which diverts; that which turns something from its proper or natural course or tendency; specifically, that which turns or draws the mind from care, business, or study, and thus rests and amuses; sport; play; pastime: as, the diversions of youth; works of wit and humor furnish an agreeable diversion to the studious.

Fortunes, honours, friends,
Are more diversions from love's proper object,
Which only is itself. Sir J. Denham, The Sophy.
We will now, for our diversion, entertain ourselves with a set of riddles, and see if we can find a key to them among the ancient poets. Addison, Ancient Medals, II.

The necessities of hunger and thirst were his greatest diversions from the reflection on his lonely condition.
Steele, Englishman, No. 28.

3. The act of drawing the attention and force of an enemy from the point where the principal attack is to be made, as by an attack or alarm on one wing of an army when the principal attack is to be made on the other wing or the center; also, generally, any act intended to draw one's attention away from a point aimed at, or a desired object. = Syn. 2. Amusement, Recreation, etc. (see pastime), relaxation.

diversity (di-vér's'i-ti), n.; pl. diversities (-tíz).
[< ME. diversite, < OF. diversite, F. diversité = Pr. diversitat = Sp. diversidad = Pg. diversidade = It. diversità, < L. diversitas (-t-), difference, contrariety, < diversus, different, diverse: see diverse, divers, a.] 1. The fact of difference between two or more things or kinds; essential difference; variety; separateness: as, the diversity in unity of the true church; the diversity of objects in a landscape.

That Babyloyn that I have spoken of, where that the Soudan duellithe, is not that gret Babyloyn where the Diversities of Languages was first made.

Great diversities between pride and honesty is scene.
Baboon Book (E. E. T. 8.), p. 89.

Then is there in this diversity no contrariety.

Strange and several noises
Of roaring, shrieking, howling, jingling chains,
And more diversity of sounds. Shak., Tempest, v. 1.

2. That in which two or more things differ; a difference; a distinction: as, diversities of opinion. = 3. Variation; diversification.

Blushing in bright diversities of day.
Pope, Moral Essays, iv. 84.

Diversity of person, in law, a plea by a prisoner in bar of execution, alleging that he is not the same who was at-tainted. — Diversity of reason, that diversity by which things are distinguished only in conception. — Diversity of reason reasoned, a distinction arising from two ways of conceiving a thing, as when we say that a triangular figure is a triangle. — Diversity of reason reasoning, a distinction arising from a thing being conceived twice over in the same way, as when we say that A is A. — Diversity of the diameter, in the Ptolemaic theory of the moon, an arc of the ecliptic by which the penumbrae of the eclipse is greater in perigee than in apogee. Also called the excess. — Real diversity, such a distinction that some fact is true of one or more things which is not true of another or others. = Syn. Dissimilarity, etc. See difference.

diversivolent, a. [< L. diversus, contrary, + volens (-t-), ppr. of velle, will, desire: see diversa, a., and voluntary.] Desiring strife. [Rare.]

Yon diversivolent lawyer, mark him! knaves turn informers, as magenta turn to flies; you may catch gudgeons with either. Webster, White Devil, III. 2.

diverso intuitu (di-vér'só in-tú'i-tú), [LL.:

A. W. Groely, Arctic Service, p. 261.

In looking east from the summit of the great "continental divide" at this point, we saw in the distance a vast plain bounded by a chain of lofty mountains.

Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 401.

2. The act of dividing; a division or partition, as of winnings or gains of any kind: as, a fair divide. [Colloq., U. S.]

divided (di-vi'ded), p. a. [Fr. of dividere, v.] Parted; separated; disunited; distributed: as, a divided hoof; a divided estate. Specifically—(a) In bot., cut into distinct segments; cleft to the base or to the midrib: applied to a leaf, calyx, etc. (b) In anatom., said of any part that is normally simple or undivided, when by exception it is formed of two parts. (c) In music, used of two instruments or voices that are usually in unison, but are temporarily given independent parts: as, with flutes divided; with soprano divided.—Divided palp, those palpi in which the last joint is split longitudinally into two parts.—Divided proposition, in logic, a proposition in which a sign of modality intervenes between the subject and the predicate.—Divided pygidium, the last dorsal segment of the abdomen when it is formed of two plates, as in the males of certain Alphididae.—Divided sense, in logic, that sense of a sign of modality which it has in a divided proposition.

dividually (di-vi'dad-li), adv. Separately; by division.

In this the middle term is taken dividually or distributively in one premise. Atwater, Logic, p. 122.

dividend (div'i-dend), n. [= D. G. Dan. Sw. dividend = F. dividende = Sp. Pg. It. dividendo, < L. dividendus, to be divided, ger. of dividere, divide: see divide, v.] 1. A sum to be divided into equal parts, or one to be distributed proportionately. Particularly—(a) In math., a number or quantity which is to be divided by another called the divisor, the result being called the quotient. (b) A sum to be divided as profits among the shareholders of a stock company, or persons jointly interested in an enterprise. (c) A sum out of an insolvent estate to be divided among its creditors.

2. The share of one of the individuals among whom a sum is so divided; a share or portion. Concerning bishops, how they ought to behave themselves toward their clerks, or of such obligations as the faithful offer upon the altar; what portions or dividends ought to be made thereof. Foxe, Martyrs, p. 102.

Cumulative dividend, a dividend with regard to which it is agreed that if at any time it is not paid in full, the difference shall be added to the following payment. Thus if a cumulative dividend is 5 per cent., and only 4 per cent. is paid, the amount due at the next payment is 6 per cent.—Dividend of (so much) per cent., a percentage on a capital stock or any other aggregate sum, of the rate named, to be distributed proportionately among shareholders or others entitled to it.—Dividend on (or off), a stock-exchange phrase meaning that, on the day of closing the transfer-books of any stock for a dividend, the transactions in such stock for cash include (or do not include) the dividend up to the time officially designated for closing the books. In stock-exchange reports usually written cum (or ex) dividend, dividend, dis, or d.—Dividend warrant, an order or authority on which a shareholder or stockholder receives his dividend.—Stock dividend, a dividend of profits, actual or anticipated, payable in reserved or additional stock instead of cash.—To declare a dividend, to announce readiness to pay a specified dividend.—To make a dividend, to set apart a sum to be divided among the persons interested in the property from which the sum is taken.—To pass a dividend, to omit to make a regular or expected dividend. [U. S.]

divident, n. [dividen (t), s., ppr. of dividere, divide.] One who divides; a divider. [Rare.]

"Divide," says one, "and I will choose." If this be but once agreed upon, it is enough; for the divident, dividing unequally, loses, in regard that the other takes the better half. Harrington, quoted in J. Adams's Works, IV. 411.

divident, n. An erroneous form of dividend. divider (di-vi'der), n. 1. One who or that which divides; that which separates into parts.

According as the body moved, the divider did more and more enter the divided body. Sir K. Digby, Nature of Man's Soul.

2. A distributor; one who deals out to each his share.

Who made me a judge or divider over you? Luke xii. 14.

Coleridge, Lay Sermons.

divinal, divinall, n. [ME. divinall, divynalle, < OF. divinaille, divinaille, divinaille, divination, a word or sign used in divination (cf. divinal, divinel, divine), < diviner, divine: see divine, v.] Divination; a sign used in divination.

What says we of hem that bilieven in divynalles, as by fight or by noyse of briddes or of beestes, or by sort, by geomancie, by dremes, by chyrkyngs of doores, or crakyngs of houses, by gawnnyngs of rattes, and sulch manere wretchednesse?

Chaucer (ed. Gilman), Parson's Tale.

divination (div-i-nā'shon), n. [F. divination = Fr. divination (cf. Sp. divination = Pg. adivinhacão) = It. divinazione = D. divinatie = Dan. Sv. divination (in comp.), < L. divinatio (n.), the faculty of foreseeing, divination, < divinare, pp. divinatus, foresee, divine: see divine, v.] 1. The act of divining; the pretended art of foretelling by supernatural or magical means that which is future, or of discovering that which is hidden or obscure. The practice of divination is very ancient, and has played an important part in the theologies of almost all nations. The first attempt to raise divination to the dignity of a science is attributed to the Chaldeans. The innumerable forms which have been in use for thousands of years may be reduced to two classes: (1) that effected by a kind of inspiration or divine afflatus; and (2) that effected by the observation of certain dispositions and collocations of things, circumstances, and appearances, etc., as the flight of birds, the disposition of the clouds, the condition of the entrails of slaughtered animals, the falling of lots, etc.

Divination hath been anciently and fitly divided into artificial and natural; whereof artificial is when the mind maketh a prediction by argument, concluding upon signs and tokens; natural is when the mind hath a presentation by an internal power, without the inducement of a sign.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II, 203.

2. Figuratively, a sort of instinctive prevision; a presentiment and knowledge of a future event or events; conjectural presage; omen.

There is much in their nature, much in their social position, which gives them a certain power of divination. And women know at first sight the characters of those with whom they converse.

Swenson, Woman.

3. In anc. Rom. law: (a) A transaction in a criminal suit, in which one of several accusers of one and the same person was chosen as the chief prosecutor in the case, the others joining in it only as subscribers. (b) The speech or oration asking authority to fill such a rôle.—Syn. 1. Prognostication, etc. See prediction.

divinator (div-i-nā-tor), n. [= F. divinateur = Fr. divinator = It. divinatore (cf. OF. divineur = Sp. adivinador = Pg. adivinhador), < LL. divinator, < L. divinare, pp. divinatus, divine: see divine, v.] One who practises divination.

In the leading paper of Cambridge, Mass., published within a stone's throw of the university, a professed divinator has kept for years a large, business-like, and soberly worded advertisement of his services.

Science, IV, 559.

divinatory (di-vin'a-tō-ri), a. [= F. divinatoire = Sp. Pg. lt. divinatorio, < *LL. *divinatorius*, < divinator: see divinator.] Pertaining to a divinator or to divination; divining.

We have seen such places before; we have visited them in that divinatory glance which strays away into space for a moment over the top of a suggestive book.

H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 308.

divine (di-vin'), a. and n. I. a. [ME. divine, divine, < OF. divin, divin, F. divin = Pr. divin, divin = Sp. Pg. lt. divino, divine, < L. divinus, divine, inspired, prophetic, belonging to a deity, < divus, divus, a deity, prop. adj., belonging to a deity; cf. deus, a god, a deity: see deity.] 1. Pertaining to, of the nature of, or proceeding from God, or a god or heathen deity: as, divine perfections; divine judgments; the divine honors paid to the Roman emperors; a being half human, half divine; divine oracles.

The Soul is a Spark of Immortality, she is a divine Light, and the Body is but a Socket of Clay.

Howell, Letters, IV, 21.

"Know thyself," was the maxim of Thales, the old Greek realist: a maxim thought so divine that the ancients said it fell from heaven.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 93.

Theology cannot say the laws of Nature are not divine; all it can say is, they are not the most important of the divine laws.

J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 22.

2. Addressed or appropriated to God; religious; sacred: as, divine worship; divine service, songs, or ascriptions.

Ful wel sche sang the service divyne.

Chaucer (ed. Morris), Gen. ProL to C. T., I, 122.

3. Godlike; heavenly; excellent in the highest degree; extraordinary; apparently above what is human.

A divine sentence is in the lips of the king.

Prov. xvi, 10.

Over all this weary world of ours,

Breathe, diviner Air!

Templeton, The Masters (No. 2).

A snug prebendary, rejoicing in the reputation of being the divinest wit and wittiest divine of the age.

Whipple, Era, and Rev., I, 10.

He (Wesley) saw the dead in sin coming to life all around him; he passed his happy years in this divinest of labors.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 79.

4. Divining; presageful; foreboding; prescient.

Yet oft his heart, divine of something ill,

Misgave him.

Milton, P. L., ix, 845.

5. Relating to divinity or theology.

Church history and other divine learning.

South.

Divine assistance. See assistance.—Divine office, the stated service of daily prayer; the canonical hours.—Divine right. (a) Of kings, the doctrine that the king stands toward his people in loco parentis, deriving his authority, not from the consent of the governed, but directly from God. This doctrine, which in English history was especially developed under the Stuarts, though still held by some as a matter of theory, has generally ceased to have practical political significance.

The Divine right of kings, independent of the wishes of the people, has been one of the most enduring and influential of superstitions, and it has even now not wholly vanished from the world.

Locky, Europ. Morals, II, 285.

(b) Of the clergy, a claim of divine authority for particular persons and particular forms of ecclesiastical government. An instance in the Roman Catholic Church is the still unsettled claim of the bishops to power in their several dioceses, as opposed to the papal theory that they rule mediately through the pope.—Divine service, the public worship of God; especially, the stated or ordinary daily and Sunday worship; in the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches, the hours or the daily morning and evening prayer, and the celebration of the eucharist.—Temple by divine service, in Ang. law, an obsolete holding, in which the tenants had to perform certain religious services, as to sing a specified number of masses, expend a certain sum in alms, etc.—The divine remedy (divinum remedium), the root of Imperialis curatio, or, more correctly, Imperialis curatio, was formerly highly esteemed in medicine, but seems to have few virtues except those of an aromatic stimulant.—Syn. 2. Holy, sacred.—3. Supernatural, superhuman.

II. n. [ME. divine, divine, divyn, a soothsayer, theologian, < OF. divin, a soothsayer, theologian, F. divin, a soothsayer (cf. Sp. adivino = Pg. adivinho, a soothsayer), = It. divino, a soothsayer, theologian, < L. divinus, a soothsayer, augur, ML. a theologian, < divinus, adj.: see I. The last sense, 'divinity,' is directly from the adj.] 1. A man skilled in divinity; a theologian: as, a great divine; "the Revelation of St. John the Divine."

Voltaire was still a courtier; and . . . he had as yet published little that a divine of the mild and generous school of Grotius and Tillotson might not read with pleasure.

Manning.

2. A minister of the gospel; a priest; a clergyman.

It is a good divine that follows his own instructions.

Shak., M. of V., I, 2.

3. A diviner; a prophet.

A grete divyn that cleped was Calcas.

Chaucer, Troilus, I, 68.

And thys ther he knew by a good divyn, Which somtyme was clerke Merlyn vnto.

Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), I, 5673.

4. Divinity.

I sauh ther bischops bolde and bachlers of divyn

Bi-come clerkes of a-counte.

Piers Plowman (A), ProL, I, 90.

Assembly of Divines at Westminster. See assembly.—Ecumenical divines. See ecumenical.—Syn. 2. Clergyman, Priest, etc. See minister, n.

divine (di-vin'), v.; pret. and pp. divined, ppr. divining. [ME. divinen, divynen, foresee, foretell, interpret, < OF. diviner, F. diviner (cf. Sp. adivinar = Pg. adivinhar) = It. divinare, < L. divinare, foresee, foretell, divine, < divinus, divinely inspired, prophetic, as a soothsayer, prophet: see divine, a.] 1. trans. 1. To learn or make out by or as if by divination; foretell; presage.

Why dost thou say King Richard is depos'd? Dar'st thou, thou little better thing than earth, Divine his downfall?

Shak., Rich. II., III, 4.

Those acute and subtle spirits, in all their sagacity, can hardly divine who shall be saved.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, I, 57.

2. To make out by observation or otherwise; conjecture; guess.

She is not of us, as I divine.

Tennyson, Maud, xxvii, 7.

The gaze of one who can divine

A grief and sympathies.

M. Arnold, Tristram and Iseult.

In you the heart some sweeter hints divines, And wiser, than in winter's dull despair.

Lowell, Bankside, II.

3. To render divine; deify; consecrate; sanctify.

She . . . seem'd of Angela race, Living on earth like Angell now divinde.

Spenser, Daphnida, I.

—Syn. 1. To prognosticate, predict, prophesy.—2. To see through, penetrate.

II. trans. 1. To use or practise divination. They (Gipsies) mostly divine by means of a number of shells, with a few pieces of coloured glass, money, &c., intermixed with them.

E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, II, 108.

2. To afford or impart presages of the future; utter presages or prognostications.

The prophete thereof divine for money.

Micah iii, 11.

3. To have presages or forebodings.

Suggest but truth to my divining thoughts.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iv, 6.

4. To make a guess or conjecture: as, you have divined rightly.

divinely (di-vin'li), adv. 1. In a divine or god-like manner; in a manner resembling deity.

Born from above and made divinely wise.

Cowper, Verses from Valerius.

As when a painter, poring on a face,

Divinely thro' all hindrance finds the man

Behind it.

Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

2. By the agency or influence of God: as, a prophet divinely inspired; divinely taught.

In his (St. Paul's) divinely-inspired judgment, this kind of knowledge so far exceeds all other that none else deserves to be named with it.

Sp. Beveridge, Works, I, xviii.

3. Excellently; in the supreme degree: as, divinely fair; divinely brave.

The Grecians most divinely have given to the active perfection of men a name expressing both beauty and goodness.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

Divinest imaged, clearest seen,

With happier seal pursued.

M. Arnold, Obermann Once More, st. 78.

divinement (di-vin'ment), n. [OF. divinement = Fr. divinement (cf. Sp. adivinamiento) = It. divinamento; as divine, v., + -ment.] Divination.

divineness (di-vin'ness), n. 1. Divinity; participation in the divine nature: as, the divineness of the Scriptures.

The second person in divinities is, Who vs assume, and bring vs to the bill. Rabbits' Voyages, I. 307.

All true work is sacred; in all work, were it but true hand-labour, there is something of divinities. Carlyle.

2. Excellence in the supreme degree.

An earthly paragon! Behold divinities No elder than a boy! Shak., Cymbeline, III. 2.

diviner (di-vi'nér), n. [ME. divinour, devinour, devinor, a soothsayer, a theologian, < OF. divineur, devineur, F. devineur, < L.L. divinator, a soothsayer: see divinator.] 1. One who professes or practises divination; one who pretends to predict events, or to reveal hidden things, by the aid of superior beings or of supernatural means, or by the use of the divining-rod.

And wotth it wote that he is the wisest man, and the beste divinour that is, sat only god. Morita (E. R. T. S.), I. 35.

These nations . . . hearkened unto observers of times, and unto diviners. Deut. xviii. 14.

2. One who guesses; a conjecturer.

A notable diviner of thoughts. Locke.

bird-diviner. Same as bird-conjurer (which see, under conjurer).

divinerece (di-vi'nér-es), n. [ME. devinerece, < F. devinerece; fem. of diviner.] A female diviner or soothsayer; the priestess of an ancient oracle. [Rare.]

The divinerece ought to have no perturbations of mind, or impure passions, at the time when she was to consult the oracle; and if she had, she was no more fit to be inspired than an instrument untuned to render an harmonious sound. Dryden, Mitarch.

diving-beetle (di-ving-bé'tl), n. A popular name for various aquatic beetles of the family Dytiscidae. They swim freely in the water, and may often be seen diving rapidly to the bottom, whence their name. See out under Dytiscus.

diving-bell (di-ving-bel), n. A mechanical contrivance consisting essentially of an inverted cup-shaped or bell-shaped chamber filled with air, in which persons are lowered beneath the surface of the water to perform various operations, such as examining the foundations of bridges, blasting rocks, recovering treasure from sunken vessels, etc. Diving-bells have been made of various forms, such as that of a bell, or a hollow truncated cone or pyramid, with the smaller end closed and the larger one, which is placed lowermost, open. The air contained within the bell prevents it from being filled with water on submergence, so that the diver may descend in it and breathe freely, provided he is furnished with a new supply of fresh air as fast as the contained air becomes vitiated by respiration. The diving-bell is now generally made of cast-iron (A), open at the bottom, and with several strong convex lenses set in its upper side or roof, to admit light to the interior. It is suspended by chains from a barge or other suitable vessel, and can be raised or lowered at pleasure, in accordance with signals given by the persons within, who are supplied with fresh air injected into a flexible pipe by means of a forcing-pump (B) placed in the vessel, while the vitiated air escapes by a cock in the upper part of the bell. An improvement on this form, called the scaphandre, enables the occupant, instead of depending upon the attendants above, as in the older forms, to raise or sink the bell, move it about at pleasure, or raise great weights with it and deposit them in any desired spot.

diving-buck (di-ving-buk), n. A book-name of the antelope Cephalophus merroni, translating the Dutch name duyterbok (which see): so called from the way in which the animal ducks or dives in the brush. See out under Cephalophus.

diving-dress (di-ving-dres), n. Submarine armor (which see, under armor).

diving-spider (di-ving-spi'dér), n. An aquatic spider, Argyroseta aquatica, which builds its nest under water, and habitually dives to reach it, carrying down bubbles of air, with which it fills its nest on the principle of the diving-bell. It is thus enabled to remain under water, though fitted only for breathing air. See out under Argyroseta.

diving-stone (di-ving-stón), n. A name given to a species of isopod.

divining-rod (di-vi'ning-red), n. A rod or twig used in divining; especially, a twig, generally of hazel, held in the hand and supposed by its bending downward to indicate spots where met-alliferous deposits or water may be found by digging. It is usually made of two twigs of hazel, or of apple or some other fruit-tree, tied together at the top with thread, or of a naturally forked branch, and is grasped by both hands in such a way that it moves when attracted by the sought-for deposit. This method of searching for ore or water has been in use for centuries, but its efficacy is now rarely credited by intelligent persons.

Shall we have most likelihood of success if we dig from east to west, or from west to east?—or will you assist us . . . with your divining-rod of witches-hazel? Scott, Antiquary, xliii.

The divining-rod of reverential study. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 47.

divining-staff (di-vi'ning-stáf), n. Same as divining-rod.

The mitre of high priests and the divining-staff of soothsayers were things of envy and ambition. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1855), I. 685.

divinist, n. [ME. dyvynistre; < divine + -ist + -er.] A diviner; a revealer of hidden things by supernatural means.

Therefore I stynte, I nam no dyvynistre. Chaucer, Knight's Tale, I. 1983.

divinity (di-vin'i-ti), n.; pl. divinities (-tiz). [ME. divinite, devynite, < OF. divinite, divinite, F. divinité = Pr. divinité = Sp. divinidad = Pg. divindade = It. divinità, divinitade, divinitate, < L. divinitas (-s), divinity, < divinus, divine: see divine.] 1. The character of being divine; deity; godhead; the nature of God; divine nature.

When he attributes divinity to other things than God, it is only a divinity by way of participation. Stillingfleet.

2. [cap.] God; the Deity; the Supreme Being: generally with the definite article.

'Tis the Divinity that sits within us; 'Tis Heaven itself that points out an hereafter, And intimates eternity to man. Addison, Cato, v. 1.

3. In general, a celestial being; a divine being, or one regarded as divine; a deity.

There's a divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will. Shak., Hamlet, v. 2.

Prudence was the only Divinity which he worshipped, and the possession of virtue the only end which he proposed. Dryden, Character of Polybius.

4. That which is divine in character or quality; a divine attribute; supernatural power or virtue.

They say there is divinity in odd numbers. Shak., M. W. of W., v. 1.

There's such divinity doth hedge a king, That treason can but peep to what it would, Acts little of his will. Shak., Hamlet, iv. 5.

There is more divinity In beauty than in majesty. Ford, Broken Heart, iv. 1.

When the Church without temporal support is able to do her great works upon the unfor's obedience of men, it argues a divinity about her. Milton, Church-Government, II. 2.

5. The science of divine things; the science which treats of the character of God, his laws and moral government, the duties of man, and the way of salvation; theology: as, a system of divinity; a doctor of divinity.

Hear him but reason in divinity, And, all-admiring, with an inward wish You would desire the king were made a prelate. Shak., Ham., v. 1. 1.

In some places the Author has been so attentive to his Divinity that he has neglected his Poetry. Addison, Spectator, No. 309.

One ounce of practical divinity is worth a painted shipload of all their reverences have imported these fifty years. Stearns.

Children are . . . brevities of doctrine, living bodies of divinity, open always and inviting their elders to pursue the characters inscribed on the lovely leaves. Alcott, Table-Talk, p. 57.

Berkshire Divinity, a name sometimes given to the theological system of Edwards, Hopkins, and others, who resided in Berkshire county, Massachusetts. Divinity itself. See col. Divinity, the name given in Scotland to a theological college, or to that department of a university in which theology is taught.—New Divinity, New-light Divinity, names given to the New England theology of Edwards and others, in the earlier history of its development.—New Haven Divinity, a popular title for a phase of modified Calvinism, deriving its name from the residence of its chief founder, N. W. Taylor (1786-1858) of Yale Theological Seminary in New Haven, Connecticut. divinisation (di-vi'ni-si-zh'n), n. [F. divinisation = It. divinizzazione; as divinus + -ation.] The act of divinizing; deification: as, the divinisation of pleasure. Also divinization. [Rare.]

With this natural bent (toward pleasure, life, and fecundity) . . . in the Indo-European race, . . . where would they be now if it had not been for Israel, and the stern check which Israel put upon the glorification and divinisation of this natural bent of mankind, this attractive aspect of the not necessary? N. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, I.

divine (div'i-nis), v. t.; pret. and pp. divined, divining. [F. diviniser = Sp. divinizar = Pg. divinizar = It. divinizzare; as divine + -ee.] To deify; render divine; regard as divine. Also divinees.

Man is . . . the animal transfigured and divinized by the Spirit. Alcott, Tablets, p. 181.

In pagan Rome, Vice was not regarded as heinous, because the Deities whom Rome worshipped were vicious, and thus Vice themselves were divinized. Bp. Chr. Wordsworth, Church of Ireland, p. 168.

divisat, n. [L. divisus, pp. of dividere, divide: see divide. Cf. divise, v.] Divided; loose; crumbling.

Thal [oranges] loveth lands that rare is divisat. Paladiusus, Hushondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 119.

divisi (di-vi'si), [It., pl. of diviso, < L. divisus, pp. of dividere, divide.] In music, separate: a direction that instruments playing from a single staff of music are to separate, one playing the upper and the other the lower notes.

divisibility (di-viz'i-bil'i-ti), n. [F. divisibilité = Sp. divisibilidad = Pg. divisibilidade = It. divisibilità, < *ML. *divisibilia* (-s), < L.L. divisibilis, divisible: see divisible.] 1. The capacity of being divided or separated into parts.—2. In arith., the capacity of being exactly divided—that is, divided without remainder.—Infinite divisibility, the character of being divisible into parts which are also divisible, and so on ad infinitum. As applied to matter, the term implies properly that any portion of matter may, by the exercise of sufficient force, be separated into parts. After the general acceptance of the Daltonian theory of atoms, the term infinite divisibility of matter was long retained with the meaning of the infinite divisibility of space.

The geometricians (y. u. know) teach the divisibility of quantity in infinitum, or without stop, to be mathematically demonstrable. Boyle, Things above Reason.

I said at first that infinite divisibility of matter was the doctrine now in vogue amongst the learned, but upon second thoughts I believe I have misrepresented them, and the mistake arose from want of distinguishing between infinite and indefinite divisibility. A. Tucker, Light of Nature, III. III. § 12.

divisible (di-viz'i-bl), a. and n. [F. divisible = Sp. divisible = Pg. divisible = It. divisibile, < L.L. divisibilis, divisible, < L. dividere, pp. divisus, divide: see divide.] 1. a. 1. Capable of division; that may be separated or disjoined; consisting of separable parts or elements: as, a line is divisible into an infinite number of points.

The outermost layer of the body is a dense chitinous cuticula, usually divisible into several layers. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 544.

2. In arith., capable of division without remainder: as, 100 is divisible by 10.

II. n. That which is susceptible of division.

The composition of bodies, whether it be of divisibles or indivisibles, is a question which must be rank'd with the indiscussibles. Glennville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, v.

divisibleness (di-viz'i-bl-ness), n. Divisibility; capability of being divided.

The divisibleness of nitre into fixed and volatile parts. Boyle, Works, I. 374.

divisibly (di-viz'i-bli), adv. In a divisible manner.

Besides body, which is impenetrably and divisibly extended, there is in nature another substance . . . which doth not consist of parts separable from one another. Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 234.

division (di-vizh'n), n. [ME. divisioun, devisioun, < OF. division, division, F. division = Pr. division, devasio = Sp. division = Pg. divisao = It. divisione = D. divisie = G. Dan. Sw. division, < L. divisio (-n), division, < dividere, pp. divisus, divide: see divide.] 1. The act of dividing or separating into parts, portions, or shares: as, the division of a word (as by means of a hyphen at the end of a line); the division of labor; the division of profits.

I'll make division of my present with you: Hold, there is half my coffee. Shak., T. N., III. 4. Specifically—(a) [L. divisio (-n), tr. of Gr. scalperia.] In logic, the enumeration and naming of the parts of a whole; especially, the enumeration of the species of a genus. The latter is also distinguished as logical division. Division is mainly distinguished from classification in that the latter is a modern word, and supposes minute observation of the facts, while the former, as an Aristotelian term, denotes a much ruder proceeding, based on ordinary knowledge, and undertaken at the outset of the study of the genus divided. One of the distinctive doctrines of the Ramist school of logicians was that all division should proceed by dichotomy.

Division is a dividing of that which is more commune into those which are less commune. As a definition therefore doeth declare what a thing is, so the division sheweth how many things are contained in the same. Sir T. Wilson, Rule of Reason (1551).

Division is the parting or dividing of a word or thing that is more general, into other words or things less general. Mumford, Arts of Logic (1590), II. 2.

(b) In her., the separating of the field by lines in the direction of the bend, the bar, etc. (called division conductus, heralds, etc.), also for the purpose of impaling two shields together, or in quartering. (c) The separation of members in a legislative house in order to ascertain the vote. This is effected in the British House of Commons by the placing of the affirmative and negative sides into separate lobbies, to be counted by tellers; in American legislatures, by their rising alternately, or, as is frequently done in the House of Representatives, by passing between tellers standing in front of the Speaker's desk. In the British House of Commons the usual method of voting on any contested measure is by division; in the United States, by ayes and noes, or affirmative and negative answers on a call of the roll.

The motion passed without a division.

Macaulay.

2. In math.: (a) The operation inverse to multiplication; the finding of a quantity, the quotient, which, multiplied by a given quantity, the divisor, gives another given quantity, the dividend. In elementary arithmetic division is often defined as, for example, "the partition of a greater summe by a lesser" (Reorde, 1540); but such a definition applies only when the quotient is an abstract number and an integer. Division is denoted by various signs. Thus,  $a$  divided by  $b$  may be written in any of the following ways:

$$a \div b, \frac{a}{b}, a/b, a:b, ab^{-1}.$$

Where multiplication is not commutative (that is, where  $xy$  is not generally equal to  $yx$ ) there are two kinds of division; for if  $xy = z$ ,  $x$  may be regarded as the quotient of  $z$  divided by  $y$ , or  $y$  as the quotient of  $z$  divided by  $x$ . These two kinds of division are denoted as follows:

$$xy = z, \frac{xy}{x} = y, \frac{xy}{y} = x, xy:y = x, x^{-1}(xy) = y.$$

Division is one of the fundamental operations in arithmetic, common algebra, and quaternions; but in other forms of algebra it generally gives an indeterminate quotient, and so loses its importance. (b) A rule or method for ascertaining the quotient of a divisor into a dividend: as, long division. (c) A section; the separation of a geometrical figure into two parts.—3. The state of being divided; separation of parts: as, an army weakened by division; divisions among Christians.

Hate is of all things the mightiest divider; nay, is division itself.

Milton, Divorce, II. 21.

4. That which divides or separates; a dividing line, partition, or mark of separation; any sign or cause of separation or distinction.

I will put a division between my people and thy people.

Ex. viii. 22.

5. A part separated or distinguished in any way from the rest; a minor part or aggregate; a distinct portion: as, the divisions of an orange; a division of mankind or of a country; the divisions of a book or of a discourse.

Express the heads of your divisions in as few and clear words as you can.

Swift.

Specifically—(a) A definite part of an army or of a fleet, consisting of a certain number of brigades or of vessels under a single commander.

For his divisions, as the times do brawl,

Are in three heads; one power against the French,

And one against Glendower; perforce, a third

Must take up us.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., I. 3.

(b) A part of a ship's company set apart for a certain service in action. Those who serve at the guns are classed as the first, second, third, and fourth divisions; the powder division provide the guns with ammunition; the master's division steer the ship and work the sails; and the engineer's division manage the engines and the boilers. (c) A geographical military command, consisting of two or more departments. Thus, the Military Division of the Missouri consisted of the department of Dakota, the department of the Platte, the department of the Missouri, and the department of Texas. The United States is divided for military purposes at the present time (1890) into eight departments (see department), the system of divisions having been discontinued. (d) In nat. hist.: (1) In zoological classification, any group of species forming a part of a larger group; in entomology, sometimes specifically applied to a group smaller than a suborder and larger than a family, as the division Gynacocera of the Heteroptera. A section may be equivalent in value to a division, or a group subordinate to it; a series is a division in which the minor groups show a regular gradation in structure. (2) In botanical classification, one of the higher grades in the sequence of groups, equivalent to subkingdom or series, as the phanerogamous and cryptogamous divisions of plants. It is also often used as subordinate to class, as the polypetalous, apetalous, etc., divisions of dicotyledonous plants. By some authors it has been used to designate a grade between tribe and order.

6. The state of being divided in sentiment or interest; disunion; discord; variance; difference.

There was a division among the people.

John vii. 43.

Between these two

Division moulders hidden.

Tennyson, Princess, III.

Earth, these solid stars, this weight of body and limb,
Are they not sign and symbol of thy division from Him?

Tennyson, The Higher Pantheism.

7. In music, a rapid and florid melodic passage or phrase, usually intended to be sung at one breath to a single syllable: so called because originally conceived as the elaboration of a phrase of long tones by the division of each into several short ones. It was common in the music of the eighteenth century.

Sweet as ditties highly penn'd,
Sung by a fair queen in a summer's bow,
With ravishing division, to her lute.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., III. 1.

Music, advance thee on thy golden wing.

And dance division from swarming string.

Middleton, Blurt, Master-Constable, I. 1.

Now that the manager has monopolised the Opera-house, haven't we the signors and signoras calling here, sliding their smooth semibreves, and garrling glib divisions in their outlandish throats?

Sheridan, The Critic, I. 1.

8. The precise statement of the points at issue in any dispute. [Rare.]

The division is an opening of thynge wherein we agree and rest upon, and wherein we stick and stand in travers, shewing what we have to sale in our owne behalfe.

Sir T. Wilson, Rhetoric (1553).

9. See the extracts.

At the University of Cambridge, England, each of the three terms is divided into two parts. Division is the time when this partition is made.

B. H. Hall, College Words.

The terms are still further divided, each into two parts; and after division in the Michaelmas and Lent terms a student who can assign good plea for absence to the College authorities may go down and take holiday for the rest of the time.

C. A. Bristol, English University, p. 87.

Accidental division, a division of a subject according to its accidents: as, good things are, according to Aristotle, either qualities of mind, qualities of body, or accidents of fortune.—Compendial division. See compendial.

Complementary division, a method of division given by Boethius. The smallest round number larger than the divisor is used, and also the complement of the divisor, or the remainder after subtracting it from the round number. The first figure of the quotient is set down, from the dividend is subtracted the product of this by the round number, and to the remainder is added the product of the same figure of the quotient by the complement of the divisor. The sum is treated as a new dividend.—Complex or compound division, the division of a complex or compound number either by a number of the same sort or by an abstract number, as the division of 3 days 18 hours 17 minutes by 1 day 18 hours 23 minutes 36 seconds, or by 7.—Direct division. (a) Division not complementary. (b) A rule for dividing one number by another, so as to obtain the entire period of the circulating decimal of the quotient. Both dividend and divisor are multiplied by the same number so as to make the last significant figure of the divisor 9. By striking off from the divisor so multiplied the 9, together with anyiphers which may follow it, and increasing the truncated remnant by 1, a number is obtained called the current multiplier. The last figure of the multiplied dividend is now struck off, multiplied by the current multiplier, and the product added to the truncated dividend. The sum is treated as a new dividend; and this process is continued until the dividends begin to repeat themselves. The successive figures struck off from the dividend from last to first are now written down from left to right as a whole number, and subtracted from the circulating part of the same figures repeated indefinitely into the decimal places. The remainder, after shifting the decimal point as many places to the left as there were zeros struck off from the divisor along with the 9, is the quotient sought.

Division by circulating decimals, a method of dividing by means of a table of circulating decimals.—Division by factors, the process of dividing successively by factors of the divisor.—Division by logarithms, a method of dividing based on the fact that the logarithm of the quotient is the logarithm of the dividend diminished by the logarithm of the divisor.—Division of a ratio, the reduction of a proportion from  $a:b = c:d$  to  $b:a = d:c$ — $a:c = d:b$ .—Division of labor, in polit. econ., the dividing up of a process or an employment into particular parts, so that each person employed can devote himself wholly to one section of the process.—Division of the question, in a legislative body, the division of a complex proposition or motion into distinct propositions, in order that each may be considered and voted upon separately: a course resorted to, upon motion or demand, when any of the members favor parts but not the whole of the measure. The presiding officer usually has the power of deciding whether such division is admissible.—Division viol. See viol.—General of division. See general, n.—Golden division, arithmetical division not complementary.—Harmonic division of a line. See harmonic.—Iron division, same as complementary division.—Logical division, any division not a partition, being either a nominal, substantial, or accidental division.—Long division, the common modern method of arithmetical division when the divisor is a number larger than 10. The greatest number of times that the divisor is contained in the first figures of the dividend, beginning with the left (a sufficient number being taken to make a number greater than the divisor), is set down to the right of the dividend, as the first figure of the quotient; the divisor is then multiplied by this quotient, and the product is subtracted from the left-hand part of the dividend; to the remainder the next figure to the right in the dividend is then annexed, and the number thus formed is treated as a new dividend; and so on. The same method is extended in the algebra to the division of polynomials in general.

The rule is of Italian origin. See scratch division.—Nominal division, an enumeration of the different senses of an equivocal word or expression; a distinction.—Partible division, the mental division of a whole into its parts, as of the English nation into sovereign, lords, and commons; partition.—Real division, a division relating to facts, not a mere distinction between different meanings of a word, embracing substantial, partible, and accidental division; the explication of a whole by its parts.—Scratch division, the ordinary method of division before long division came into general use, late in the seventeenth century. The products were not set down at all, but only the remainders. The divisor was set down under the dividend; the first figure of the quotient was then set down and was multiplied by the first figure of the dividend, and the remainder was set down over the corresponding figure of the dividend, which was immediately cancelled, together with the first figure of the dividend. This process having been repeated until the whole divisor had been cancelled, the latter was written down again one place further to the left, the second figure of the quotient was set down, and the whole proceeding repeated until a remainder was obtained less than the divisor. The following shows the successive stages of the division of 251 by 13:

$$\begin{array}{r} 19 \\ 13 \overline{) 251} \\ \underline{26} \phantom{1} \\ 181 \\ \underline{169} \phantom{1} \\ 121 \\ \underline{117} \\ 41 \\ \underline{39} \\ 21 \\ \underline{26} \\ 51 \\ \underline{52} \\ 1 \end{array}$$

The rule was derived from Arabian writers.—Short division, a process of division practised with a divisor not larger than 10, in which the quotient is set down directly, being written from left to right, usually below a line under the dividend, without auxiliary figures.—Substantial division, or division per se, the division of a genus into its species.—To run division, in music, to make florid variations on a theme.

Running division on the panting air.

B. Jonson, Poetaster, IV. 2.

No could not run division with more art

Upon his quaking instrument than she.

The nightingale, did with her various notes

To do the business for. See business.—To do to death.
See death.—To do up. (a) To put up; raise; open. See do.

Up the wyndow did he hastily.

Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 612.

(b) To wrap and tie up, as a parcel: as, do up these books neatly, and send them off at once. (c) To dress and fasten, as the hair.

It is easy to be merry and good-humored when one's new dress fits exquisitely, and one's hair hasn't been frictious in the doing up.

Mrs. Whitney, Leslie Goldthwaite, iv.

(d) To freshen, as a room with paint, paper, and upholstery, or a garment by remodeling.

Dangle?

Mrs. Dangle. And what has you to do with the theatre,
Mrs. Dangle?

Sheridan, The Critic, l. 1.

What's to do here? what is the matter here? what is it all about?

What's to do here, Thomas Taggart? Let's withdraw.

Shak., M. for M., l. 2.

II. do. 1. To act; be in action; be active in performing or accomplishing; exert one's self in relation to something.

Doing is activity, and he will still be doing.

Shak., Hen. V., III. 7.

Be busy your self,

And do not talk, but do.

Fletcher (and another?), Prothemas, iv. 1.

Mechanic soul, thou must not only do

With Martha, but with Mary ponder too.

Quarles, Emblema, iv. 7, Epig.

Let us then be up and doing.

Longfellow, Psalm of Life.

2. To act or behave; conduct one's self: with adverbial adjuncts indicating manner of acting: as, to do well by a man.

If your Spirit will not let you retract, yet you shall do well to repress any more Copies of the Satire.

Howell, Letters, II. 2.

Behold God hath judg'd and done to him in the sight of all men according to the verdict of his own mouth.

Milton, Elkonoklastes, III.

3. To succeed (well or ill) in some undertaking or action; get along; come through.

On the Tuesday they went to the tourney; where they did very nobly.

Shak., Arthur's Eng. Garner, l. 478.

4. To arrange; contrive; shift: as, how shall we do for food?

How shall we do for money for these wars?

Shak., Rich. II., II. 2.

How shall I do to answer as they deserve your last letters?

Richardson.

5. [Cf. the equiv. OF. comment la faites-vous?
lit. how do you make it? G. was machen sie?
lit. what make you? The sense of do in this usage merges in do. See do, do.] To be (well or ill); be in a state with regard to sickness or health; fare: as, we asked him how he did; how do you do?

How does my cousin Edward, uncle?

R. Johnson, Every Man in his Humour, l. 1.

Sir John Walter asked me lately how you did, and wished me to remember him to you.

Howell, Letters, l. IV. 24.

My dear Lady Sneerwell, how do you do to-day? Mr.
Snake, your most obedient.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, l. 1.

Have done, do, do, give over.
Moses. Sir, this is Mr. Premium, a gentleman of the strictest honour and secrecy: . . . Mr. Premium, this is—Charles S. Pshaw! I have done—Sir, my friend Moses is a very honest fellow, but a little slow at expression.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, III. 2.

To do for. (a) To act for or in behalf of; provide or manage for: as, he does well for his family. (b) To ruin; defeat effectually; injure fatally.

This pretty smooth dialogue has done for me.

Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, II.

"They have done for me at last, Hardy," said he [Nelson], as he was raised up from the deck; "my backbone is shot through."

Amer. Cyc., XII. 222.

To do without, to dispense with; succeed or get along without: as, I can do without the book till Saturday.

The Romance words are some of them words which we cannot do without for some particular purpose, but which are not, by the first needs of speech, always on our lips.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 162.

To have done with, to have come to an end of; have finished; cease to have part or interest in or connection with:
as, I have done with speculating; I have done with you for the future.

III. auxiliary and substitute. 1. As an auxiliary, do is inflected, while the principal verb is in the infinitive without to, and originally and strictly the object of do: thus, I do know is I perform an act of knowing. Compare shall and will.

O blessed Bond! O happy Marriage!

Which does the match 'twixt Christ and us preface!

Spenser, tr. of Du Barren's Works, l. 6.

The youth did ride, and soon did meet

John coming back again. Cooper, John Gilpin.

Certain uses of do as an auxiliary, with both transitive and intransitive verbs, may be pointed out. (a) In forming interrogative and negative expressions: as, do you want this book? I do not long for it; does he do his work well? he does not do it as well as I expected.

You seem to marvel I do not marry all this while, considering that I am past the Meridian of my Age.

Howell, Letters, l. VI. 60.

(b) With the imperative, sometimes, to help the expression of the subject: as, do thou go (instead of go, or go thou); do you stay here (instead of stay, or stay you here).

(c) To express emphasis: as, I do wish you had seen him;
I did see him; do be quick; do not (do not) do that. (d) Sometimes (now chiefly in poetry, where it is often used for merely metrical reasons, but formerly often in prose) merely as an inflection of the principal verb, with no other effect.

A fair smooth front, free from least wrinkle,

Her eyes (on me) like stars do twinkle.

Howell, Letters, l. V. 21.

Greeks and Jews, together with the Turks, do inhabit the towns, and are admitted their churches and synagogues.

Goldsmith, Traveller, p. 21.

For do does die, how ever noble *do*ance,
And thoughts of men do as themselves decay.

Spenser, Ruins of Time, l. 400.

See. My lord, you once did love me.

Ham. Do I do still, by those pickers and stealers.

Shak., Hamlet, III. 2.

This just reproach their virtue does excite.

Dryden.

2. Do, being capable of denoting any kind of action required by the circumstances in connection with which it is used, is often employed as a substitute for the principal verb, or for the whole clause directly dependent upon it, to avoid repetition: as, conduct your business on sound principles; so long as you do, you are safe.
In such an expression there is an ellipsis either of the principal verb or of do, that, these things, so, etc.: as, I intend to come, but if I do not you will know how to act;
so long as you do (so), you are safe.

The next morrow we sayd masse as we did the tuesday be for.

Turkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 43.

I held it great injustice to believe

Thine enemy, and did not.

Bacon and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, iv. 2.

Thus my soul still moves Eastward, as all the heavenly Bodies do.

Howell, Letters, l. VI. 22.

I . . . chose my wife as she did her wedding-gown, not for a fine glossy surface, but for such qualities as would wear well.

Goldsmith, Vicer, l.

do (dō), n. [Formerly also doe; < do, v.] 14.
Endeavor; duty; all that is required of one, or that one can do.

No sooner does he peep into

The world but he has done his do.

mality in choosing of the Council and Officers.

Pepps, Diary, April 11, 1692.

3. A trick; a cheat; a hoax. [Slang.]

I thought it was a do, to get me out of the house.

Dickens, Sketches.

do (dō), v. t.; pret. did, pp. done, ppr. doing.
[Now identified in form and inflection with the much more common and comprehensive verb do.] The senses of do and do, v. t., are so intermingled that it is impossible to separate them completely. All uses not obviously belonging to do it is best to refer to do. Same as do and do, dial. do, which is phonetically the right modern form: see do.] To suit; be fit or suitable; serve the purpose or end in view;
avail; suffice: as, will this do?

Ab. Well, recruit will do—let it be so.

Fag. O, sir, recruit will do surprisingly.

Sheridan, The Rivals, II. 1.

"Let women vote!" cries one. "Why, wives and daughters might be Democrats, while their fathers and husbands were Whigs. It would never do."

W. Phillips, Speeches, p. 24.

Not so careful for what is best as for what will do.

Lovell, Biglow Papers, Int.

To do for, to suit for; serve as; answer the purpose of;
be sufficient for; satisfy: as, this piece of timber will do for the corner post; a trusty stick will do for a weapon; very plain food will do for me.

Of course, it is a great pleasure to me to sit and talk with Mrs. Benson, while you and that pretty girl walk up and down the piazza all the evening; but I'm easily satisfied, and two evenings do for me.

C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 22.

do (dō), An old English form of done, past participle of do.

With thy Ryght kne lette hit be do,

Thy worshipp thou mayst cause so.

Babees Book (R. M. T. S.), p. 12.

do (dō), n. [A mere syllable, more sonorous than ut, for which it is substituted.] In solm-ization, the syllable now commonly used for the first tone or key-note of the musical scale, and also for the tone C (as the key-note of the typical scale of the pianoforte keyboard). About 1670 it replaced the Aretinian ut, which is still somewhat used in France. In the tonic sol-fa system it is spelled do, and indicated by its initial d; its significance is limited to the first tone of the scale, without reference to the keyboard. In teaching sight-singing by the help of solm-ization, two general methods are in use: (a) the fixed-do method, in which do is always applied to tones bearing the letter-name C, whether they are key-notes or not; and
(b) the movable-do method, in which do is always applied to the key-note, whatever be its letter-name. The second method is generally regarded as the more scientific, and is far the more practical, although the first has had the support of many excellent musicians.

do. An abbreviation of ditto.

do (dō), n. [R. dob, plaster, gutter, mire;
dobam, I plaster, daub.] A dark sandy clay

dobla (dō'blā), n. [OSP. (= Pg. dobra), fem. of doble, now doble, = F. doble, > E. double, q. v.] A gold coin formerly used in Spain. The earliest coins so called are Moorish dinars, coined by the Almohade dynasty, and distinguished from the earlier dinars by having the full weight of a mithqal, while the fineness was reduced so that they should be of the same value. As coined by John II. of Castile in 1442, there were 49 to the mark (230.04 grams), of a fineness of 19 carats, making the value $2.47.

doblet, a. An obsolete form of double.

II. n. See privat-doceat.

Doceat (dō'sē'tā), n. pl. [LL., < Gr. doceat, < docein, seem.] A sect of heretics of the first and second centuries who denied the human origin of Christ's body, some holding that it was a mere phantom, and others that it was real but of celestial substance. Thus they believed the incarnation, crucifixion, and resurrection of Christ to have been mere appearances or illusions. Strictly this name seems to have belonged to a single sect of the second century, but it is commonly used indifferently or collectively of the various Gnostic sects which held similar views on this point. Certain Monophysites afterward taught a doctrine as to Christ's body related to that of the Doceats. See Apharistic Doceat, Phantasia.

Doceat (dō'sē'tik), a. [< Doceat + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or held by the Doceats: as, "Doceat gnosticism," Plumtree.

The World stands in Admiration of the Capacity and Doctileness of the English.

Howell, Letters, iv. 67.

doctile (dos'il or dō'sil), a. [Formerly also doctil; = F. doctile = Sp. doctil = Pg. doctil = It. doctile, < L. doctilis, easily taught, teachable, < docere, teach. Cf. didactic.] 1. Teachable; easily taught; quick to learn; amenable.

Dogs soon grow accustomed to whatever they are taught, and being doctile and tractable, are very useful.

H. Ellis, Voyage to Hudson's Bay.

2. Tractable; easily managed or handled.

The ore is doctile and contains ruby-silver and sub-sulphides.

L. Hamilton, Mex. Handbook, p. 98.

The different ores of the Rayo Mine are doctile in their reduction, undergoing the common Spanish amalgamation process. Quoted in Mexico's Arizona and Sonora, p. 168.

doctility (dō-sil'i-tē), n. [= F. doctilité = Sp. doctitud = Pg. doctitude = It. doctilità, doctitudine, < L. doctilitas (-s), teachableness, < doctilis, teachable, doctile: see doctile.] The quality of being doctile; teachableness; readiness or aptness to learn; tractableness.

The humble doctility of little children is, in the New Testament, represented as a necessary preparative to the reception of the Christian faith.

Beattie, Moral Science, I. II. 8.

doctimacy (dos'i-mā-si), n. A less correct spelling of doctimasy.

Docimaster (dos-i-mas'tēs), n. [NL. (Gould, 1850), also Docimaster (Bonaparte, 1850), < Gr. doxmuarh, doxmuarh, an assayer, examiner, < doxmu, assay, test, examine.] A genus of humming-birds, notable for the enormous length of the beak, which may exceed that of all the rest of the bird. D. ensiferus is the only species. The bill is from 3 to 4 inches long, the whole bird being from 7½ to 8½ inches. The bill is used to probe long tubular flowers for food, whence the generic name. This remarkable humming-bird inhabits the United States of Colombia, Ecuador, and Peru. The male is chiefly green, varied with brown and purple tints; the throat, bill, and feet are black, the throat varied with buff, and behind the eye is a white spot.

doctmastic (doo-i-man'tik), a. [= F. doctmasticus, n., doctmastic (cf. Sp. doctmasticus = Fr. doctmastic, n., doctmastic), < Gr. doctmasticus, < doctmastic, an assayer, examiner, < doctmastic, assay, test, examine, scrutinise, < doctmastic, assayed, tested, examined, approved, < doctmastic, take, approve.] Proving by experiments or tests; assaying; specifically, relating to the assaying of metals: as, the doctmastic art. Also doctmastic.

doctmasty (doo-i-mas'ti), n. [Also written doctmasy, and less correctly doctmacy; = F. doctmasty = Sp. Pg. doctmasty, < Gr. doctmasty, an assay, examination, scrutiny, < doctmastic, assay, examine: see doctmastic.] 1. In Gr. antiq., particularly at Athens, a judicial inquiry into the civic standing, character, and previous life of all persons elected for public office, of youths applying for enrolment on the list of full citizens, of persons aiming at political leadership, etc. The inquiry was public; any citizen might denounce the subject of it, and his civic privileges were suspended if he could not justify himself.

2. The art or practice of assaying metals, or the art of separating metals from foreign matters, and of determining the nature and quantity of metallic substances contained in any ore or mineral. — 3. The art of ascertaining the nature and properties of medicines and poisons, or of ascertaining certain facts pertaining to physiology.

doctmology (doo-i-mol'ô-jî), n. [< Gr. doctmologos, assayed, examined, tested (see doctmastic), + -logia, < lôgion, speak: see -ology.] A treatise on the art of assaying or examining metallic substances.

doctm (doo'shu), a. [Appar. a var. of docile, with suffix -ous. Cf. docily.] Docile; amenable. [Colloq., western U. S.]

I can hardly keep my tongue doctm now to talk about it. Spirit of the Times (New York).

docty (doo'ti), n. [Also written docty (Halliwell); a contr. of docty, q. v.] Quickness of comprehension; docility; gumption. Groves; Bartlett. [Local, Eng. and U. S.]

doek (dok), n. [Early mod. E. also dooke; < ME. dooke, dooke (> OF. doque, doogue, doue, F. dial. doque, doque, doque, patience), < AS. dooc, rarely dooc (gen. doocan, whence late ME. doekan, E. dial. doeken, doekan), doek (L. lappa, lappa, rumex), used also with descriptive adjectives, sed false dooce, the fallow-dock, golden dock (Eumex maritimus), sed rotte dooce, the red dock (E. sanguineus), sed soarge dooce, the sharp dock (E. acutosa), and in comp. ed-dooc (= ODan. ed-doek), water-dock (water-lily, Nuphar luteum), sir-dooc, sour dock (E. acutosa), wudu-dooc, wood-dock (E. acutosa); = MD. doock (in comp. doock-bladeren (glossed potatoes), Flem. doock-bladeren = G. doock (prob. < D.), Colchicum autumnale, in comp. doock-bladeren, Eumex acutus; doock-brast, burdock, Arctium lappa; wasser-doock, water-lily. The relation of these forms to the Celtic is not clear; cf. Gael. dogha, burdock, Ir. meacan-dogha, burdock (meacan, a tap-rooted plant, as the carrot, parsnip, etc.).] 1. The common name of those species of Eumex which are characterized by little or no acidity and the leaves of which are not heartate. They are coarse herbs, mostly perennials, with thickened rootstocks. Some of the European species are troublesome weeds and widely naturalized. The roots are astringent and slightly tonic and laxative, and have been used as a remedy in cutaneous affections and numerous other diseases. Particular designations are bitter dock, E. obtusifolius; curled or yellow dock, E. crispus; fiddle-dock (from the shape of the leaves), E. pulcherr; golden dock, E. maritimus; patience dock, E. Patencia; sharp or sour dock, E. Acutus; soarge dock, E. acutifolius; water dock, E. Burdock; and E. Hydrilapsum; and white dock, E. californica.

Nothing seems
But hateful docks, rough thistles, barks, burns.
Shak. Han. V. v. 2

2. A name of various other species of plants, mostly coarse weeds with broad leaves, as dove-dock, the coltsfoot, Tussilago Farfara; elf-dock, the elecampane, Inula Holentium; prairie-dock, Silphium terebinthinum; round dock, the common mallow, Malva sylvestris; spatter-dock, the yellow pond-lily, Nuphar advena; sweet dock, Polygonum Distorta; velvet dock, the mullein, Verbascum Thapsus. See burdock, candock, and herdock. — In doek, cut petiole, a formula used as an incantation in the north of England. If a person is stung with a nettle, doek-leaves are rubbed on the affected part, and the formula is repeated. It was long used proverbially to express unobedience or inconstancy, or sudden change.

Uncertaine certaine, never loves to settle,
But here, there, everywhere; do doek, and doek.
John Taylor, Wattle (1609).

Who fight with words for life care not but doek,
Since 'tis no more than this, in doek, and doek.
Wrangling Lovers (1677).

doek (dok), n. [Early mod. E. also dooke; < (1) ME. doek (rare), < Icel. doekr, a short stumpy tail (Haldorsen); cf. doggr, a conical projection (Haldorsen); supposed to be nearly related to (2) Icel. doekr, a windlass, and to Icel. doock (Haldorsen) = Norw. doeka = Sw. doeka = Dan. doeka, a skein, = Fries. doek, a bundle, bunch, ball (of twine, straw, etc.), = LG. doeka, a bundle (of straw, thread, etc.), a skein of silk or yarn, whence G. doock, a bundle, bunch, plug, skein of thread, etc., a thick, short piece of anything. These words, again, are prob. identical with (3) Norw. doeka = Sw. doeka = Dan. doeka = MD. doock = East Fries. doek, dooke = LG. doock = OHG. toocka, tooka, a doll, MHG. tooke, a doll, a young girl, G. doock (after LG.), a doll. From the LG. form in this third group are derived (prob.) E. doek, q. v., and doey, q. v.] 1. The tail of a beast cut short or clipped; the stump of a tail; the solid part of a tail. — 2. The buttocks; the rump.

I will not go to school but when we lest [list].
For there beginneth a sorry feast
When the master should lift my doek.
The World and the Child (Halliwell's Dodsley, I. 247).
Some call the Bishops weathercocks
Who where there heads were turn their doeks.
Coivell.

3. The fleshy part of a boar's chine, between the middle and the rump. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.] — 4. A case of leather to cover the clipped or cut tail of a horse. — 5. A piece of leather forming part of a crupper. Groves. [Prov. Eng.] — 6. The crupper of a saddle. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.] — 7. The stern of a ship. [Scotch.]

Pictorial Chron. of Scotland, p. 108.

doek (dok), v. t. [< ME. doeken, dokken, cut off the tail, cut short, curtail, < doek, tail: see doek, n.] The connection of thought between 'tail' and 'cut short' appears again in the perverted form curtail, orig. curtail. The resemblance to W. tocho, tocho, clip, dock, is prob. accidental. Hence doeked.] 1. To cut off, as the end of a thing; cut short; clip; curtail: as, to doek the tail of a horse.

His heer was by his eres round ybarn,
His top was doeked lyk a prest beforen.
Chaucer, Gen. Pro. to C. T., l. 580.
To pluck the eyes of Sentiment,
And dock the tail of Rhyme.
O. W. Holmes, Musio-Grinders.

Hence — 2. To deduct a part from; shorten; curtail; diminish: as, to doek one's wages.

We know they [bishops] hate to be doeked and clipped.
Milton, Reformation in Eng., l.

They . . .
Came, with a month's leave given them, to the sea:
For which his gains were doeked, however small.
Tempest, Sea Dreams.

Some pretend to find defects in the work, and doek the payments without a shadow of justice.
The American, XIV. 344.

3. Naut., to elue up (a corner of a sail) when it hinders the helmsman from seeing: usually with up. — 4. To cut off, rescind, or destroy; bar: as, to doek an entail.

doek (dok), n. [< MD. doock = D. doek = Flem. doek, a dock; cf. (from the E. or D.) Sw. doeka = Dan. doek, dooke = G. doock, doock = F. doock, a dock. Origin unknown; cf. OFlem. doock, a cage (see doock); Icel. doek, doek, a pit, pool, = Norw. dokk, dokk, dokk, a hollow, low ground surrounded by hills. The word is by some connected with It. doocka, a canal, conduit, pipe, formerly also "a damme of a mill" (Florio), ult. < L. ducere, lead (see doock, duf), or with ML. doge, a ditch, canal, also a vessel, cup, perhaps < Gr. doge, a receptacle, < doek, receive.] In hydrostatic engin., strictly, an inclosed water-space in which a ship floats while being loaded or unloaded, as the space between two wharves or piers; by extension, any space or structure in or upon which a ship may be berthed or held for loading, unloading, repairing, or safe-keeping. The water-space may communicate freely with the stream or harbor, or the entrance to it may be closed by a gate or by a lock. If provided with a lock or gate, the level of the water within the dock remains at all times nearly the same, as the gate is opened only at full tide, when the level without and within is the same. If a lock is employed, vessels can pass in and out at all stages of the tide, but this does not materially affect the level of the water inside the dock. In an open dock the tide continually lowers or raises the vessel, and this interferes in some degree with the work of loading or unloading. The closed docks are free from this inconvenience, while a greater advantage is found in the absence of currents. In a larger sense the term is also applied to a basin or inclosed water-space for the storage of floating timber or the safe-keeping of river-stemmen, barges, or canal-boats laid up for the winter, and by a further extension is made to include the wharves and warehouses on or in the neighborhood of a dock. The largest closed docks are at Liverpool and London, in England. In a particular sense the term is also applied to the construction and apparatus used in repairing and building ships, as the floating dock, dry-dock, depositing-dock, and cantional dock.

The saide shipp, called the Holy Crosse, was so shaken in this voyage, and so weakened, that she was layd vp in the doock, and neuer made a voyage after.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II. l. 68.

Depositing-dock, a caisson or an elevator for lifting vessels from the water and placing them upon stages or wharves erected for the purpose. The lifting apparatus consists of a series of caissons or pontoons, placed side by side and joined at one end to another pontoon that, with a series of upright tubular structures, forms a girder and makes the back of a comb-like structure, of which the pontoons are the teeth. In the rear of the girder is a large floating pontoon, connected with it by two rows of heavy booms that, being pivoted at each end, serve as a series of parallel bars and keep the entire structure upright while afloat. To lift a vessel, a row of blocks with shores and chocks is arranged on top of all the pontoons. The air is allowed to escape, and the entire structure, except the float in the rear, sinks till the vessel can be floated over the pontoons. When the vessel is in position the water is pumped out of the pontoons, and they all rise together, lifting the vessel out of the water. — Dry-dock, a dock or an excavated basin adjoining navigable water, provided with a gate, and so arranged that, after the docking of a ship, the water can be exhausted from it. Such docks are long and narrow, with sloping sides formed in steps. The modern method of construction is to excavate the basin in the shore, and to drive heavy piling along the bottom and upon the sloping sides and rear end. Upon the piles are laid heavy timbers to form the floor and the steps at the sides. At the entrance are double gates opening outward, and meeting at an angle when closed, to resist the pressure of the water on the outside when the dock is empty. A recent method of closing a dry-dock is by means of a floating gate or caisson with flat bottom and wide stem and stern, which is floated into position across the entrance and loaded with water-balls till it sinks, fitting tightly by a keel into a groove in the gateway. To use the dock, the gate is opened, or floated away at high water, and the ship is drawn into the dock and held afloat over a line of blocks along the center of the dock. The gate is then put in position, and sunk till the dock is closed and tight. The water within the dock is then exhausted by steam-pumps, leaving the ship supported on the blocks, and braced on both sides by shores extending to the dock-steps. A typical dry-dock is the Brooklyn Navy-yard Dock No. 1, which is 500 feet long, 60 feet wide at the bottom, and capable of admitting a ship drawing 18 feet. Steam-pumps with a capacity of 40,000 gallons of water a minute are used to empty it. — Floating dock, a capacious wooden or iron structure, generally rectangular, intended to serve as a graving-dock. Sometimes floating docks are built in water-tight compartments, and can be sunk to the required depth by the admission of water into these compartments. When the vessel is docked, the floating dock is raised by pumping, till its bottom touches the keel of the ship. Shores are then added to keep the ship in position, and the dock is raised higher. Instead of compartments, water-tight tanks are occasionally used, and the dock is raised and lowered on the same principle. A floating dock may also be made so heavy as to sink by its own weight deep enough to receive the largest vessel, and be raised by means of empty water-tight tanks, which lift dock and ship by their buoyancy.—Graving-dock, a dry-dock: so called because used in graving or cleaning the bottom of ships. The graving-docks in the navy-yards of Brooklyn, Boston, and Norfolk are important examples.—Half-tide dock, a basin connecting two or more docks, and communicating with the entrance-basin.—Sectional dock, a floating dock composed of a succession of pontoons or calsons attached to a platform below the vessel. Steam-pumps are used to remove the water from the calsons, and, as they float, the vessel is raised.

dock<sup>3</sup> (dok), v. t. [= D. Flem. dokken = Dan. dokke, dock; from the noun.] To bring or draw into or place in a dock.

It floweth 18. foot, that you may make, dock, or carine ships with much facility.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, I. 111.

dock<sup>4</sup> (dok), n. [Appar. the same word as dock<sup>3</sup>; cf. OFlem. docke, a cage.] The place where a criminal stands in court.

Here will be officers, presently; bethink you
Of some course suddenly to escape the dock;
For thither you'll come else.

R. Jonson, Alchemist, v. 5.

There is no docking for accidental delays. . . . I do not find in the time-book a single instance of dockage for any reason.
Phila. Times, March 20, 1893.

dockage<sup>2</sup> (dok'aj), n. [cf dock<sup>3</sup> + -age.] Provision for the docking of vessels; accommodation in a dock; the act of docking a vessel; the charge for the use of a dock: as, the port has ample dockage; dockage, so much (in an account).

The plethora of "cities" and "city sites," whose prospects the vast dockage and trade territory of Chicago has superseded.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXII. 324.

doekan, n. See doeken.

dock-block (dok'blok), n. A pulley-block secured to a dock, and used in loading and unloading vessels.

docked (dokit), p. a. [cf ME. docked; pp. of dock<sup>3</sup>, v.] Cut off short; having the end or tail cut off; specifically, in entom., cut off sharply in any direction, as if with a knife; truncated, as a tip or apex.

doeken, doekan (dok'en, -an), n. [Dial. var. of dock<sup>3</sup>.] The dock, a plant of the genus Eumec. [Scotch and North. Eng.]

Wad ye compare yer sell to me,
A doeken till a tansie?

Ritson's Scottish Songs, I. 182.

docker (dok'er), n. [cf dock<sup>3</sup>, v. t. + -er.] A stamp used to cut and perforate the dough for crackers or sea-biscuit.

doeket (dok'et), n. [Formerly sometimes spelled doquet (as if of F. origin), and with altered form dogget; cf late ME. docket; appar. dok, v., + dim. -et (less prob. cf ME. docket, var. of docked, pp. of dock, v., and thus lit. 'a thing cut short,' 'an abridgment').] 1. In general, a summarised statement; an abridgment or abstract; a brief.

On the outer edge of these tablets a docket is occasionally inscribed in alphabetic characters, containing a brief reference to the contents, evidently for the purpose of enabling the keeper of the records to find any particular document in the archives where they were piled up.
Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 253.

2. In law: (a) A summary of a larger writing; a paper or parchment, or a marginal space, containing the heads of a writing; a digest. (b) A register of judgments, more specifically of money judgments. Thus, a judgment for the foreclosure of a mortgage and sale of the property is not docketed in this sense; but if after sale there remains a deficiency for which a defendant is personally liable, the judgment for the deficiency is docketed against him, thus being made a lien on his real property in the county or district. (c) A list of causes in court for trial or hearing, or of the names of the parties who have causes pending, usually made in the order in which the causes are to be called. (d) In England, the copy of a decree in chancery, left with the record and writ clerk, preparatory to enrolment.—3. A bill tied to goods, containing some direction, as the name of the owner or the place to which they are to be sent; also, a ticket attached to goods, specifying their measurement. See ticket.—4. A shred or piece. [Prov. Eng.].—5. A woodman's bill. [Prov. Eng.].—To strike a docket, in law, to give a bond to the lord chancellor, engaging to prove the debtor to be a bankrupt, whereupon a fiat of bankruptcy is issued against the debtor: said of a creditor.

docket (dok'et), v. t. [cf docket, n.] 1. In law: (a) To make an abstract or summary of the heads of, as a document; abstract and enter in a book: as, judgments regularly docketed. (b)

To make a judgment a lien on lands.—2. To enter in a docket; write a brief of the contents of, as on the back of a writing.

They were all docketed and marked, and tied with red tape.
Theobry, Vanity Fair.

3. To mark with a docket or ticket.

1. A cutting or clipping, as of a horse's tail.—

2. The operation of cutting and piercing the dough for sea-biscuit.

dockmache (dok'mak-i), n. A common name in the United States for the Verbena acerifolia, sometimes used as an application to tumors.

dock-master (dok'mas'ter), n. One who has the superintendence of docks.

dock-rent (dok'rent), n. Charge for storing and warehousing goods in a dock.

dock-warrant (dok'wor'ant), n. In England, a certificate given to the owner of goods warehoused in the docks; a warehouse-receipt. When a transfer is made, the certificate is indorsed with an order to deliver the goods to the purchaser. The warrant thus becomes an authority for the removal of the goods.

The holder of a dock-warrant has a prima-facie claim to the pipes of wine, hales of wool, hogheads of sugar, or other packages named thereon.
Jewins, Money and Mech. of Exchange, p. 207.

dockyard (dok'yård), n. A yard or magazine near a harbor, for containing all kinds of naval stores and timber. Dockyards belonging to the government (called in the United States navy-yards) usually include dry-docks for repairing ships, and slips on which new vessels are built, besides the storehouses and workshops.

doemac (dok'mak), n. A silurid fish of the genus Bagrus (B. doemac), inhabiting the Nile. It is a kind of catfish.

The genus Bagrus, of which the Bayad (B. bayad) and Doemac (B. doemac) frequently come under the notice of travellers on the Nile. Gutcher, Encycy. Brit., XXII. 68.

Dooglossa (dok-ō-glos'sa), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dokōs, a bearing-beam, a beam, bar; + glossa, tongue.] A group or order of diocious gastropods, characterised by having transverse rows of beam-like teeth on the odontophore or lingual ribbon. Different limits have been assigned to it.

(a) In Trochæli's system it was made to include the limpet-like gastropods and the chitons. (b) In Olli's and later systems it is restricted to the limpet-like forms, as the families Patellida, Acanthida, and Lepetida.

dooglossate (dok-ō-glos'sat), a. and n. [An Dooglossa + -ate.] 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dooglossa; being one of the Patellida or limpets.

At any rate, it is certain that the old views of a close relation between the Polypacophora and the dooglossate Gastropoda had very little morphological basis.
Science, IV. 225.

II. n. A gastropod of the order Dooglossa.

doquet, n. and v. An obsolete form of docket.

doctor (dok'tor), n. [Early mod. E. also doctur; < ME. doctour, doctur, doctur, doktor, a doctor (of divinity, law, or medicine), < OF. doctour, doctur, F. docteur = Pr. Sp. doctor = Pg. doctor = It. dotto = D. G. doctor = Dan. Sw. doktor, < L. doctor, a teacher, ML. esp. in the university sense, < doctore, teach; see doctile.] 1. A teacher; an instructor; a learned man; one skilled in a learned profession.

But frowns haven forgotten this, . . .
Wher [whether] Francis or Domynt other Austen or deynide

Any of this dotardes doctor to worthe (become).
Piers Plowman's Creed (R. E. T. S.), I. 580.

Then stood up one in the council, a Pharisee, named Gamaliel, a doctor of the law.
Acts v. 34.

The best and ablest doctors of Christendom have been actually deceived in matters of great consequence.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 377.

Who shall decide, when doctors disagree,
And soundest casuists doubt, like you and me?

Pope, Epistle to Lord Bathurst, l. 1.

2. In a university, one who has passed all the degrees of a faculty, and is thereby empowered to teach the subjects included in the faculty; a person who has received the highest degree in a faculty: as, a doctor in divinity. The degree is also regularly conferred by certain technical schools, as those of medicine, and, under certain conditions, by colleges. An honorary degree of doctor, as of divinity or law, is often conferred by universities and colleges. The degree of doctor differs only in name from that of master. When there was but one degree in each faculty, the graduate was called a master in Paris, a doctor in Bologna. The faculty of the decretals being modeled after that of Bologna, those who took the highest degree in law were called doctors. This title was afterward extended to masters in theology, and finally to masters in medicine. The degrees of doctor conferred by universities, colleges, and professional schools include doctor of divinity (L. doctus in theologia doctor, abbreviated D. D.; or magis theologiae doctor, abbreviated S. T. D.; or doctor theologiae, abbreviated D. T.); doctor of medicine, abbreviated D. M. (L. medicus doctor, abbreviated M. D.); doctor of laws (L. legum doctor, ab-bricated LL. D.); doctor of civil law, abbreviated D. C. L. (L. legis civilis doctor); doctor of both laws (civilis et canonis) (L. juris utriusque doctor, abbreviated J. U. D.); doctor of philosophy, abbreviated D. P. (L. philosophiae doctor, abbreviated Ph. D.); doctor of sciences (L. scientiarum doctor, abbreviated Sc. D.); doctor of music, abbreviated D. M. (L. musicae doctor, abbreviated Mus. D.);—the abbreviations of the Latin forms being more commonly used; doctor of dental surgery, abbreviated D. D. S.; doctor of veterinary surgery, abbreviated D. V. S.

With us there was a Doctor of Phisick.

To speke of phisick and of surgerye.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 411.

And the nombre of doctours of Crayle and phisick was grete exceedingly. Sir E. Gryfforde, Fygyrmas, p. 6.

The doctor of the civil law had to prove his knowledge of the Digest and the Institutes.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 211.

Specifically.—3. A person duly licensed to practise medicine; a physician; one whose occupation is to cure diseases. [In the second and third senses much used as a title before the person's name (and then often abbreviated Dr.), or alone, as a customary form of address: as, Doctor Martin Luther; Doctor Johnson; Dr. Holmes; come in, doctor.]

When ill, indeed,
Fen dismissing the doctor don't always succeed.
Colman the Younger, Lodgings for Single Gentlemen.

4. A minor part of certain pieces of machinery employed in regulating the feed or in removing surplus material; specifically, the roller in a power printing-press which serves as a conductor of ink to the distributing rollers (see crab-roller, drop-roller): as, a color-doctor; a cleaning-doctor; a lint-doctor, etc. [In some uses the word is probably a corruption of L. doctor, leader.]—5. An auxiliary steam-engine; a donkey-engine.—6. In wine-making: (a) A liquor used to mix with inferior wine to make it more palatable, or to give it a resemblance to a better wine. (b) A liquor used to darken the color of wine, as boiled must mixed with pale sherry to produce brown sherry. See sherry, mosto, and must.—7. A translation of a local name in North Africa of the bird Emberiza striolata. See the extract.

The house-sparrow is not found; between Morocco and Mogador its place is taken by a beautiful bird (Emberiza striolata), locally called tabib, or "the doctor."
Encycy. Brit., XVI. 333.

8. Same as doctor-fish.—9. pl. False or doctored dice. [Old slang.]

Now, Sir, here is your true dice; a man seldom gets anything by them; here is your false, Sir; hey how they run!
Now, Sir, those we generally call doctors.

Mrs. Centlivre, Gamester, I.

Doctor of philosophy. (a) In the German universities, a degree corresponding to master of arts. (b) In some American universities, a degree superior to that of master of arts. Abbreviated Ph. D. See above, 2.—Doctors' Commons. See commons.

doctor (dok'tor), v. [= ML. doctorare, make or become a doctor, confer the degree of doctor on; from the noun. See doctor, n.] I. trans.

—2. To repair; mend; patch up. [Colloq.]—

3. To confer the degree of doctor upon. [Rare.]

I am taking it into serious deliberation whether I shall or shall not be made a Doctor, and . . . I begin to think that no man who deliberates is likely to be doctored.
Southey, Letters, III. 190.

Albertus Magnus was thirty-five years of age before he was doctored by the University of Paris in 1245.

Lauris, Universities, p. 212.

4. To disguise by mixture or manipulation; especially, to alter for the purpose of deception; give a false appearance to; adulterate; cook up; tamper with: as, to doctor wine or an account. [Colloq. or slang.]

The Cross Keys . . . had doctored ale, an odour of bad tobacco, and remarkably strong cheese.
George Eliot, Felix Holt, xxviii.

The news all came through Northern channels, and was doctored by the government, which controlled the telegraph. H. Greeley, in New York Independent, June, 1862.

II. intrans. 1. To practise physic.—2. To receive medical treatment; take medicine: as, to doctor for ague. [Colloq.]

doctoral (dok'tor-al), a. [Formerly also doctoral; = F. doctoral = Sp. doctoral = Pg. doctoral = It. dotto + doctore, < NL. doctorealis, < L. doctor, doctor; see doctor.] Relating or pertaining to the degree of doctor, or to the profession of a teacher or doctor.

But Rabbi in Israel, and Rab and Mar in Babylon, began to be Doctoral titles about that time.
Purshes, Pilgrimage, p. 172.

Magisterial or doctoral authority and truth.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 211.

The dignity with which he [Hume] wears the doctored fur renders his absurdities infinitely more grotesque.
Macaulay, Macaulay.

doctrinally (dok'tr-nl-i), adv. In the manner of a doctor. Halstead. [Rare.]
doctorate (dok'tr-āt), n. [F. doctorat = Sp. doctorado = Pg. doctorado = It. dottorato = D. doctoratus = Sw. doktorat, < ML. doctoratus, doctorship, doctorate, < L. doctor, a doctor: see doctor and -ate.] The degree of doctor.

I thank you . . . for your congratulations on my advancement to the doctorate.

Sp. Hurd, To Warburton, Letters, civi.
 According to Wood, in 1595 Nicolas Staughton, of Exeter College, was admitted doctor both of civil and canon law; and it is not impossible that there were other attempts to revive the canon law doctorate as an adjunct to the degree in civil law.

doctor (dok'tr), v. t.; pret. and pp. doctored, ppr. doctoring. [< doctor + -ate; appar. with ref. to doctorate, n.] To make a doctor of; confer the degree of doctor upon. Watson. [Rare.] Also doctorise.

Even after Balerum had a teacher of law it could not doctor in law. Laurie, Universities, p. 123.

doctor-box (dok'tr-boks), n. In doing, a piece of copper attached to doctor-shears to prevent the exposure of too much color to the atmosphere: used for colors susceptible to quick oxidation, such as pencil-blue.

There is less especial difficulty in printing pencil-blue with the cylinder. Thousands of pieces are weekly printed in America, and a considerable number here. The apparatus used is a doctor-box.

W. Crookes, Dyeing and Calico-printing, p. 483.

doctress, doctress (dok'tr-es, -tres), n. A female physician.

Should you say an ague were a fever, the doctresses would have a shaking fit of laughter.

Whitlock, Manners of Eng. People, p. 47.

doctor-fish (dok'tr-fish), n. A fish of the genus Acanthurus: so called from the sharp and glassy, lancet-like, movable spines with which it is armed on each side of the tail, so that it cannot be handled incautiously with impunity. All the species belong to the tropics. Also called doctor, surgeon, surgeon-fish, barber-fish.
doctor-gum (dok'tr-gum), n. A South American gum of uncertain derivation, but usually considered to be a product of Rhus Metopium. Also called hog-gum.

doctorial (dok'tr-ī-əl), a. [< doctor + -ial.] Pertaining to or characteristic of a doctor, professor, or teacher.

His humour of sententiousness and doctorial stills is a mask he delights in, but you ought to know him and not be frightened by it. G. Meredith, The Egoist, xviii.

doctorisation (dok'tr-ī-sā-shn), n. [< doctor + -ise + -ation.] The ceremony of investing a candidate for the doctorate with the doctor's hood.

doctorise (dok'tr-īz), v. t. [< doctor + -ise.] Same as doctorate.

Lord Northampton and I were doctorized in due form. Titcher, W. H. Fremont.

doctorly (dok'tr-lī), a. [< doctor + -ly.] Of, pertaining to, or like a learned man; scholarly. Sp. Hall.

doctorship (dok'tr-ship), n. [< doctor + -ship.] The degree or rank of a doctor; doctorate.

In one place of Cartwright's book he speaks of Whitgift's "bearing out himself, by the credit of his doctorship and deanery." Strype, Whitgift, an. 1572.

doctress, n. See doctress.

doctrinaire (dok'tr-nēr), n. and a. [= D. doctrinair = Dan. Sw. doktrinär, < F. doctrinaire, < *ML. *doctrinarius*, pertaining to doctrine, < L. doctrina, doctrine: see doctrine.] I. n. 1. One who theorizes without a sufficient regard to practical considerations; a political theorist; an ideologist; one who undertakes to explain things by one narrow theory or group of theories, leaving out of view all other forces at work.

He [Melbourne] said a doctrinaire was a fool, but an honest man. Greville, Memoirs, Sept. 25, 1834.

In our opinion, there is no more unsafe politician than a conscientiously rigid doctrinaire, nothing more sure to end in disaster than a theoretic scheme of policy that admits of no pliancy for contingencies.

Loomis, Study Windows, p. 160.

2. In French Met., during the period of the Restoration (1815-30) and later, one of a class of politicians and political philosophers who desired a constitution constructed on historical principles, especially after the analogy of the British constitution. They were opposed to absolutism and to revolutionary ideas, and were devoted to abstract theories and theories rather than to practical politics. Their chief leaders were Royer-Collard and Guizot.

3. A characteristic of a doctrinaire or unpractical theorist; merely theoretical; insisting upon the exclusive importance of a one-sided theory.

The whole scheme [of civil-service organization] of 1870 and 1872 must be pronounced to have been a grave mistake: it is a doctrinaire, a doctrinaire, as quite unsuited to the practical requirements of the public service.

Nineteenth Century, XX, 501.

In his [Justin Moser's] wayward and caustic style, he often criticizes effectively the doctrinaire narrowness of his contemporaries. Ensign, Bril., XIX, 264.

doctrinal (dok'tr-nl), a. and n. [Formerly also doctrinall; = F. doctrinal = Sp. doctrinal = Pg. doctrinal = It. dottrinale, < LL. doctrinālis, pertaining to doctrine, theoretical (ML. neut. doctrinale, a book of doctrine), < L. doctrina, doctrine: see doctrine.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to doctrine; consisting of or characterized by doctrine; relating or pertaining to fundamental belief or instruction: as, doctrinal theology; doctrinal soundness in religion, science, or politics; a doctrinal controversy.

There are four kinds of disputation, whereof the first is called doctrinal, because it appertaineth to science. The second is called dialectical, which belongeth to probable opinion.

The doctrinal element is not a thing independent, purely theoretic, disconnected from the realities of life and history. G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 2.

2. Serving for instruction or guidance; having the office or effect of teaching.

The word of God no otherwise serveth, than . . . in the nature of a doctrinal instrument. Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

Action is doctrinal, and teaches both art and virtue.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 29.

Doctrinal disputation. See disputation, 2.

II. n. Something that is a part of doctrine; a tenet or article of belief.

Not such as assent to every word in Scripture can be said in doctrinals to deny Christ. South.

doctrinally (dok'tr-nl-i), adv. In a doctrinal manner; in the form of doctrine; by way of teaching or positive direction; as regards doctrine. Milton.

doctrinarian (dok'tr-nār-ī-an), n. [*< ML. *doctrinarius* (see doctrinaire) + -an.] A doctrinaire; a political theorist. J. H. Newman.

doctrinarianism (dok'tr-nār-ī-an-izm), n. [< doctrinarian + -ism.] The principles or practices of doctrinarians or doctrinaires; mere theorizing or speculation, as opposed to practical principles; blind adhesion to one-sided theories.

He [the student of Russian civilization] will find the most primitive institutions side by side with the latest products of French doctrinarianism, and the most childish superstitions in close proximity with the most advanced free-thinking. D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 82.

doctrine (dok'tr-in), n. [< ME. doctrine, < OF. doctrine, F. doctrine = Pr. Sp. doctrina = Pg. doutrina = It. dottrina = G. doktrín = Dan. Sw. doktrin, < L. doctrina, teaching, instruction, learning, knowledge, < doctor, a teacher, < doctore, teach: see doctor.] 1. In general, whatever is taught; whatever is laid down as true by an instructor or master; hence, a principle or body of principles relating to or connected with religion, science, politics, or any department of knowledge; anything held as true; a tenet or set of tenets: as, the doctrines of the gospel; the doctrines of Plato; the doctrine of evolution.

If they learn pure and cleane doctrine in youth, they pour out plenty of good works in age.

Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 64.

That they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. Tit. II, 10.

The New Testament contains not only all doctrines necessary to salvation, but necessary to moral teaching.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 294.

2. The act of teaching; instruction; course of discipline; specifically, instruction and confirmation in the principles of religion.

For Saint Paul saith that all that written is To oure doctrine it is I write you.

Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 622.

He shall be wel taught in outerte and speche, For such doctrine shal hym here and teche.

Rom. of Percy (E. E. T. S.), l. 77.

This act hath two several methods of doctrine, the one by way of direction, the other by way of caution.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II, 223.

Doctrine of chances. See probability.—Doctrine of correspondences. See correspondence.—Doctrine of cy-près. See cy-près.—Doctrine of definite proportion. See definite theory, under atom.—Doctrine of enumerated powers. See enumeration.—Doctrine of occasional causes. See occasional.—Monroe doctrine. In American politics, the doctrine of the non-intervention of European powers in matters relating to the American continent. It received its name from statements contained in President Monroe's annual message to Congress in December, 1823, at the period of a suspected concert of the powers in the Holy Alliance to interfere in Spanish America in behalf of Spain. The following are the most significant passages in the message: "We could not view an interposition for opposing them [the Spanish-American republics] or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power, in any other light than as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. . . . The American continents should no longer be subjects for any new European colonial settlement."

The only thing which the Monroe Doctrine really contains is the intimation on the part of the United States of a right to resist attempts of European Powers to alter the constitutions of American communities.

G. P. Fisher, Outlines of Universal Hist., p. 602.

—Syn. 1. Precept, Doctrine, Dogma, Tenet. Precept is a rule of conduct, generally of some exactness, laid down by some competent or authoritative person, and to be obeyed; it differs from the others in not being especially a matter of belief. (See principle.) Doctrine is the only one of these words referring to conduct, and in that meaning it is biblical and ecclesiastical. In the Bible it refers equally to teaching as to the abstract truths and as to the duties of religion: "In vain they do worship me, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men." (Mat. xv. 9.) As distinguished from dogma and tenet, doctrine is a thing taught by an individual, a school, a sect, etc., while a dogma is a specific doctrine formulated as the position of some school, sect, etc., and pressed for acceptance as important or essential. Dogma is falling into disrepute as the word for an opinion which one is expected to accept on pure authority and without investigation. Tenet is a belief viewed as held, a doctrinal position taken and defended. It is equally applicable to the beliefs of an individual and of a number; it has no unfavorable sense.

Here [shall] patriot Truth her glorious precepts draw, Fledged to religion, liberty, and law.

Story, Motto of Salem Register, Life of Story.

How the bold teacher's doctrine, sanctified

By truth, shall spread throughout the world dispersed.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I, 215.

2. Strictly, a written or printed paper containing an authoritative record or statement of any kind; more generally, any writing or publication that may be used as a source of evidence or information upon a particular subject or class of subjects; specifically, in the law of evidence, anything bearing a legible or significant inscription or legend; anything that may be read as communicating an idea (including thus a tombstone, a seal, a coin, a sign-board, etc., as well as paper writings).

Saint Luke professes not to write as an eye-witness, but to have investigated the original of every account which he delivers: in other words, to have collected them from such documents and testimonies as he . . . judged to be authentic.

Paley, Evidences, viii.

Document bill, a bill of exchange accompanied by a document as collateral security, such as a bill of lading, policy of insurance, or the like, of merchandise on its way to market, given to a banker or broker in return for an advance of money. The bill is drawn against a part of the estimated value of the goods covered by the collateral security. Used especially of an Indian bill drawn on London. Also called documentary exchange.—Public document, one of the regular official publications of a government, containing reports, statistics, etc. Often abbreviated pub. doc.

To teach with authority; instruct; school.

I am finely documented by mine own daughter.

Dryden, Don Sebastian, iv. 1.

What, you are documenting Miss Nancy, reading her a Lecture upon the pinch'd Coll; I warrant you.

Mrs. Centlivre, Bold Stroke, II.

2. To support by recorded evidence; bring evidence of; prove. Jameson.

This city was so often destroyed, her monuments and charters lost, that her original cannot well be documented.

Blue Blanket, p. 4.

Since the story [La Terre] cannot remain valuable as literature, but must have other interest as a scientific study, . . . it seems a great pity it should not have been fully documented.

Harper's Mag., LXXVI, 642.

3. To furnish with documents; furnish with instructions and proofs, or with papers necessary to establish facts: as, a ship should be documented according to the directions of law.

No state can exclude the properly documented subjects of another friendly state, or send them away after they have been once admitted, without definite reasons, which must be submitted to the foreign government concerned.

Woolsey, Introduct. to Intern. Law, § 52.

There were 256 disasters to documented vessels.

The American, XII, 330.

documental (dok-ū-men'tal), a. [< document + -al.] 1. Pertaining to instruction. Dr. H. More.—2. Same as documentary.

documentary (dok-ū-men'tā-ri), a. Pertaining to or derived from documents; consisting in documents.

We have, through the whole, a well-ordered and documentary record of affairs. Frederick, Span. Lit., I, 163.

Documentary evidence. See evidence.—Documentary exchange. Same as document bill (which see, under document).—Documentary hypothesis. In Biblical criticism, the hypothesis that the Pentateuch is composed of two or more documents of which Moses or some later and unknown author was the editor. See Rohdewitz, Jehovistic.

documentation (dok-ū-men-tā'shon), n. [< ML. documentatio(-n-), a reminding, < L. documentum, a lesson, example, warning, etc.: see document.] Instruction; teaching.

"I am to be closeted, and to be documented," proceeded he. "Not another word of your documentations, dame Selby; I am not in a humour to hear them; I will take my own way." Richardson, Sir Charles Grandison, VI, 127.

documentize (dok-ū-men-tīz), v. [< document + -ize.] I. trans. To didactize. II. trans. To instruct; admonish.

The Attorney-General . . . desired the wife would not be so very busy, being, as he said, well documented, meaning by this Whittacre. Roper North, Examen, p. 204.

Doddy trees or herbs and other lyke, [L. deomo, capula.] Prompt. Parv., p. 123.

The more that he dodded the heairs [hairs], so mych more thei wexen [grew]. Wydely, 2 Kl. xiv. 26 (Oxf.).

do<sup>2</sup> (dod), n. [< Gael. dod, peevishness, a pet. Hence doddy<sup>2</sup>.] A fit of ill humor or sullenness. Jamieson. [Scotch.]

Your mother should na be eegret on in her anger, when she happens, poor body, to tak the dods now and then. Galt, The Entail, II, 143.

do<sup>3</sup> (dod), n. [Origin obscure.] 1. The fox-tail reed. [North. Eng.].—2. A shell. [Prov. Eng.].—3. In tile-making, a mold with an annular throat through which clay is forced to form drain-pipe.

Our husbandmen in Middlesex make a distinction between dodding and threshing of wheat, the former being only the beating out of the fullest and fairest grain, leaving what is lean and lank to be threshed out afterwards. Our comment may be said to have dodded the Sheriffs of several Counties, insisting only on their most memorable actions. Fuller, Worthies, xv.

dodaars, n. [*A (Dutch) sailors' name; also written dodaars, mod. D. as if *dodaars, < dood, = E. doad, + aars = E. ear: see further under dood.*] Same as dodo. Bontius.

faces of an ordinary icosahedron. It has 12 faces, 12 vertices, 30 edges, 5 sides per face, and 5 sides per vertex. The succession of faces about a vertex involves the vertex twice, the succession of vertices about a face involves the face once, and the center is triply inclosed.—Great stellated dodecahedron, in geom., a regular solid each face of which is formed by stellating a face of the great dodecahedron. It has 12 faces, 20 vertices, 30 edges, 5 sides per face, and 5 sides per vertex. The succession of faces about a vertex goes once round the vertex, while the succession of vertices about a face goes twice round the center of the face, and the center is quadruply inclosed.—Ordinary dodecahedron, in geom., a regular body, a species of pentagonal dodecahedron. It has 12 faces, 20 vertices, 30 edges, 5 sides per face, and 5 sides per vertex. Its surface is 30.46478 times the square of a side, its volume 7.66119 times the cube of a side. The ordinary dodecahedron of geometry is an impossible form among crystals, for its faces extended would cut the axes at distances from the center having an irrational ratio to each other. The form approximating most closely to it is the pentagonal dodecahedron, or the pyritohedron, in which the faces are five-sided, but not regular pentagons.—Regular dodecahedron, in geom., a dodecahedron whose faces are all regular polygons, and whose vertices are all regular solid angles. There are in fact four such figures; but those which inclose the center more than once being commonly neglected, the term regular dodecahedron is used for the ordinary dodecahedron.—Rhombic dodecahe- hedron, in geom., a solid formed by stellating each face of the ordinary dodecahedron. It has 12 faces, 12 vertices, 30 edges, 5 sides per face, and 5 sides per vertex. The succession of faces about a vertex goes once round the center of the face twice, and the center of the solid is twice inclosed.—Truncated dodecahedron, a dodecahedron formed by cutting off the faces of the regular dodecahedron parallel to those of the coaxial icosahedron so as to leave the former decagons. It is one of the thirteen Archimedean solids.

dodecamerous (dō-de-kam'e-rus), a. [< Gr. dōdeka, twelve, + μέρος, part.] In bot., having the parts of the flower in twelves. Also written 12-merous.

dodecander (dō-de-kan'dér), n. [< dodecandrous, q. v.] In bot., a plant having twelve stamens; one of the class Dodecandria.

Dodecandria (dō-de-kan'dri-ā), n. pl. [NL.: see dodecandrous.] A Linnaean class of plants having twelve stamens, or any number from twelve to nineteen inclusive, provided they do not cohere by their filaments.

dodecandrian (dō-de-kan'dri-an), a. Same as dodecandrous.

dodecandrous (dō-de-kan'drus), a. [< Gr. dōdeka, twelve, + ἀνδρ (andr), a male. (In mod. bot. a stamen).] Having twelve stamens; belonging to the class Dodecandria.

dodecapetalous (dō-dek-a-pet'g-lus), a. [< Gr. dōdeka, twelve, + πέταλον (petalon), a leaf (in mod. bot. a petal).] In bot., having twelve petals; having a corolla consisting of twelve parts.

dodecarchy (dō-de-kār-ki), n. [< Gr. dōdeka, twelve, + ἀρχία, (archia, rule.] Government by twelve chiefs or kings. [Rare.]

The so-called Dodecarchy, or "government of the twelve" petty kings, appears now in an interregnum of the Dynasty.

H. S. Oshorn, Ancient Egypt, p. 46.

dodecasemic (dō-dek-a-sē'mik), a. [< Gr. dōdeka, of twelve times, < dōdeka, twelve, + σήμα, a sign, mark, mora, < σήμα, a sign, mark.] In pros., consisting of twelve mora or units of time; having a magnitude of twelve normal shorts: as, a dodecasemic foot (for instance, the trochee semantus). An Ionic dippody, a dactylic or an anapestic tripod, a trochee or an iambic tetrapody, is dodecasemic.

Dodecandrous Plant (Common Nettle).

dodecasyllable (dō'dek-sī-lē), a. and n. [Gr. dōdeka, twelve, + syllabē, a syllable: see syllable.] I. a. In arch., having twelve columns in front: mid. of a portico, etc. II. a. A portico having twelve columns in front.

dodecasyllabic (dō'dek-sī-lē-ik), a. [Gr. dodecasyllabos + -ic.] Containing twelve syllables.

dodecasyllable (dō'dek-sī-lē-ē-bl), n. [Gr. dōdeka, twelve, + syllabē, a syllable: see syllable.] A word of twelve syllables.

dodecatemoron (dō'dek-sī-tē-mō-rī-on), n. [LL., < Gr. dōdekateimoron, a twelfth part, < dōdeka, twelve, + teimoron, a part.] A twelfth part. [Rare.]

dodecatemoron (dō'dek-sī-tē-mō-rī-on), n. [LL., < Gr. dōdekateimoron: see dodecatemoron.] A twelfth part: a term formerly sometimes used for a sign of the zodiac, as being the twelfth part of a circle.

Dodecatheon (dō-de-kathē-on), n. [NL., < L. dodecatheon, an herb, so called after the twelve greater gods, < Gr. dōdeka, twelve, + theos, a god.] A North American genus of primulaeous plants, much resembling the cyclamen of Europe. They are smooth perennials with a rosette of radical leaves and an upright scape bearing an umbel of handsome purple or white nodding flowers. The more common eastern species, D. media, is known as shooting-star. There are several other very similar species of the western coast, from California to Alaska.

dodecuple (dō-dek'ū-plet), n. [Gr. dōdeka, twelve, + -uple, as in quintuple, octuple, etc., + -et. Cf. octuplet.] In music, a group of twelve notes to be performed in the time of eight.

dodge (dōj), v.; pret. and pp. dodged, pp. dodging. [First recorded in early mod. E.; perhaps (the term -ge being appar. due to a ME. form **dodien*, **dodien*; cf. soldier, pron. sol'djēr) connected with Sc. dod, jog, North. E. dad, shake, whence the freq. forms dodder, doddle, dadder, diddle; cf. didder, diddle.] I. intr. 1. To start suddenly aside; shift place by a sudden start, as to evade a blow or escape observation. As I am an old fox-hunter, I should have turned and dodged, and have played them a thousand tricks they had never seen in their lives before. Addison, Sir Roger at the Play.

2. To shift about; move cautiously, as in avoiding discovery, or in following and watching another's movements: as, he dodged along byways and hedges; the Indians dodged from tree to tree.

For he had, any time this ten years full, Dodged with him, betwixt Cambridge and the Bull. Milton, Ep. Hobson, l.

3. To play tricks; be evasive; play fast and loose; raise expectations and disappoint them; quibble.

Now I must To the young man send humble treaties, dodge And palter in the shifts of lowness. Shak., A. and C. III. 9.

You know my passion for Martha, and what a dance she has led me; she dodged with me above thirty years. Addison.

4. To jog; walk in a slow, listless, or clumsy manner. [Colloq., North. Eng.]

II. trans. 1. To evade by a sudden shift of place, or by trick or device; escape by starting aside, or by baffling or roundabout movements: as, to dodge a blow; to dodge a pursuer or a creditor; to dodge a perplexing question.

A speck, a mist, a shape, I wist! And still it near'd and near'd: As if it dodged a water-sprite, It plunged, and tacked, and veered. Coleridge, Ancient Mariner, III.

It might have begun otherwise or elsewhere, but war was in the minds and bones of the combatants, it was written on the iron leaf, and you might as easily dodge gravitation. Emerson, Emancipation Proclamation.

2. To play fast and loose with; baffle by shifts and pretexts; trick. [Colloq.]

He dodged me with a long and loose account. Tennyson, Sea Dreams.

dodge (dōj), n. [< dodge, v.] A shifty or ingenious trick; an artifice; an evasion.

Some, who have a taste for good living, have many harmless arts, by which they improve their banquet, and innocent dodge, if we may be permitted to use an excellent phrase that has become vernacular since the appearance of the last dictionary. Trenchard.

In the friction of competition, expedients which the successful deceiver thinks fair enough may become dodges in the eyes of his fellows, who had not happened to think of them.

Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 84. dodger (dōj'ēr), n. [< dodge + -er.] 1. One who dodges or evades; one who practises artful shifts or dodges.

A scurvy haggler, a lousy dodger, or a cruel extortioner. Colver.

He had a rather slight and dissolute mode of conversing, and furthermore avowed that among his intimate friends he was . . . known by the sobriquet of "The Artful Dodger." Dickens, Oliver Twist, viii.

2. A small handbill distributed in the streets or other public places. [U. S.]

A number of printed dodgers were distributed in different parts of the city, and also posted on the doors of all houses occupied by the Chinese. Philadelphia Times, Sept. 23, 1886.

3. Same as corn-dodger. [U. S.]

dodgery (dōj'ēr-ē), n. [< dodge + -ry.] Trickery; a trick.

When he had put this dodgery upon those that gaped for the vacancy, it was a feast of laughter to him. By Hooker, Alp. Williams, p. 98.

dodgily (dōj'ī-lē), adv. [< dodgy + -ly.] Artfully; cunningly.

The Ewer strains water into his basin, on the upper one of which is a towel folded dodgily. Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 323, note.

dodgy (dōj'ī), a. [< dodge + -y.] Disposed to dodge; evasive; artful; cunning.

dodgypate, dodgypate (dōj'ī-pāt), n. [< ME. dodgypate, equiv. to dodgipoll, both meaning 'dodged' (i. e., shaven) head, in contemptuous reference to the priestly tonsure; < dod, ME. dodden, shear, shave, + pate.] Same as dodgipoll.

dodgipoll, dodgypoll (dōj'ī-pōl), n. [Also written dodgipole, dodgipole, dodgipole, dodgipole, ME. dodgipoll, equiv. to dodgypate, q. v.; < dod, ME. dodden, shear, shave, + poll, head.] A stupid person; a thickhead.

Some will say, our curate is naught, an ass-head, a dodgipoll. Latimer, 3d Sermon bef. Edw. VI.

This Noah was laughed to scorn; they, like dodgipolls, laughed this gully fairly to scorn. Latimer, Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1560.

dodkin (dōd'kin), n. [Also written dotkin; var. of dotkin: see dotkin.] See dotkin.

dodman (dōd'man), n. [Early mod. E.; origin obscure. Also called hodmandod, q. v.] 1. An animal that casts its shell, like the lobster and crab.

A sely dodman crepe. By. Bale, Kynges Johan, p. 7.

2. A shell-snail.

dodo (dō'dō), n. [*< Pg. doudo, a dodo, < doudo, doido, a simpleton, a fool, < doudo, doido, adj., simple, foolish. According to Dies, this word, which is unknown in Spanish, came from England (?) to E. dial. (Devon) doid, stupid, confused: see dolt. Cf. booby, a bird so named for a similar reason. The bird was also named by the Dutch (1) walgh-vogel, now walg-vogel, lit. 'nauseous bird'; also (2) dod-aers, lit. 'dead-arse,' 'propter fodam posterloris partis crassitatem' (note dated 1626), or because of some resemblance to the dabchick or little grebe, which was also so called; also (3) dronte (> Dan. dronte = Sw. dront); origin unknown. The NL. name is didus, Sp. didu: see Didus.] A recently extinct bird of Mauritius, *Didus inop-

Dodo (Didus inopatus). From a painting in the Belvedere, Vienna.

tus, the type of the family Dididae and suborder Didi, now usually assigned to the order Columba. The dodo was living in Mauritius on the discovery of that island by the Portuguese under Mascarenhas in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and it is known to have survived until July, 1681. Knowledge of the bird was for some time confined to the quaint and often questionable narratives of voyagers, certain pictures, mostly by Dutch artists, and a few fragmentary remains. In 1866 bones in abundance were found, and the osseous structure has been described in detail. The dodo was a massive, clumsy, flightless, and defenseless bird, about as large as a swan, covered with downy feathers, with a very stout hooked bill, short strong legs, short tail, and wings too small for flight; so that it soon succumbed under the new conditions which the occupation of the island introduced, its extinction being probably due as much to the animals which man introduced as to the human invaders of the island. The solitaire (Phaethon solitaria) of Rodrigues, an island of the same group, was similar to the dodo, but sufficiently distinct to be placed in a different genus. (See solitaire.) The neighboring island of Réunion or Bourbon also had a dodo, in all probability a third kind.

You shall receive . . . a strange fowle: which I had at the Island Mauritius called by the Portugalls a Do: which for the rareness thereof I hope will be welcome to you. Emmanuel Altham, letter written in 1681.

The Dodo comes first to a description: here and in Dyracrus (Rodrigues) (and no where else, that I ever could see or hear of) is generated the Dodo (a Portuguese name it is, and has reference to her simplicity, a bird which for shape and rareness might be call'd a Phoenix (wer 't in Arabia). Sir T. Herbert, Travels (ed. 1688).

Dodonian (dō-dō-nē-an), a. [< L. Dodonius, < Dodona, < Gr. Dodōnē, Dodona.] Of or pertaining to the ancient town of Dodona, beneath Mount Tomarus in Epirus, and to the famed sanctuary and oracle of Zeus (Jupiter) seated in a grove of oaks at that place. The oracle was one of the most ancient of the Greeks, and ranked with those of Delphi in Greece and of Zeus Ammon in Libya as one of the three in highest repute. Recent excavations on the site have brought to light a rich collection of works of art, particularly of small bronzes, and a large number of inscriptions, many of them on leaden plates. Also written Dodonian, Dodonian.

The wreath of wild olive distinguishes the Olympian from the Dodonian Jupiter, who has the crown of oak-leaves. C. O. Müller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 893.

It is in the great prayer, where Achilles addresses Zeus as Dodonian and Phaëlian.

dodrans (dō'drans), n. [< LL., contr. of 'dequadrans, three fourths, lit. less one fourth, < de, away, + quadrans, a fourth: see quadrant.] 1. In Rom. metrology, three fourths; especially, three fourths of a Roman foot, equal to 8.75 English inches.—2. An ancient Roman coin.

dodrum (dōd'rūm), n. [< Sc. Cf. dod.] A whim; a crotchety. Jamieson.

Ne'er fash your head w' your father's dodrum. Galt, The Entail, III. 21.

doe (dō), n. [*< ME. doo, do, earlier da, < AS. dā (once, glossing L. 'damna vel damnum') = Dan. daa, in comp. daa-dyr (dyr = E. deer), deer, fallow deer, daa-hind (hind = E. hind), doe, daa-hjort (hjort = E. hart), buck, daa-kat (kat = E. calf), fawn, = Sw. dof, in comp. dof-hind, a doe, dof-hjort, a buck, = OHG. tūwe, damo, MHG. tūwe, G. dam-, in comp. dam-buck (buck = E. buck), dam-hirsch (hirsch = E. hart), dam-thier (thier = E. deer), dam-wild, daan-, taan-wild (wild = E. wild), a deer, = F. daim, m., deer, daine, f., doe, = Pr. dam = Sp. dama = It. daino, m., daina, f., damma, f., < L. dāma, damma (f., used also as m.), a deer, prob. connected with damare = E. tame, q. v. The AS., Scand., and mod. G. forms are variously altered from the normal form in their derivation from the L. dāma. The native AS. word is hind: see hind.] 1. The female of the deer (the feminine corresponding to buck) and of most antelopes.*

There might men does and roes yse, And of squyrels ful grete pte. Rom. of the Rose, l. 1601.

It was a stag, a stag of ten, Bearing his branches sturdily; . . . It was there he met with a wounded doe, She was bleeding deathfully. Scott, L. of the L., IV. 25.

2. The female of the hare or rabbit.

doe, v. and n. An obsolete spelling of do.

doe (dō), n. [< Sc. origin obscure.] The wooden ball used in the game of shinty. Also called knout.

doe-bird, n. See dough-bird.

Dodidurus (dō-di-kū-rus), n. [NL., prop. 'Dedidurus, < Gr. dōidēf (dōidē), a pestle, + dōidē, tail.] A genus of glyptodonts or fossil armadillos, having only three digits on the fore feet and four on the hind. D. giganteus is the typical species, from the Pleistocene of South America. Burmeister, 1875.

doer (dō'ēr), n. [< ME. doer, doere, < AS. dōere, < dōn, do: see do.] 1. One who does something; one who performs or executes; an efficient actor or agent.

If we should now excommunicate all such wicked doers, there would be much ado in England. Latimer, 3d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1560.

The doers of the law shall be justified. Rom. II. 13.

Tut, tut, my lord, we will not stand to prate: Talkers are no good doers. Shak., Rich. III., I. 2.

Thy story I'll have written, and in good too, In prose and verse, and by the ablest doer. Pletcher, Double Marriage, IV. 2.

Specifically—2. In Scott's law, an agent or attorney.

does (dūz). [Early mod. E. also does, dō's, < ME. doe, doe, commonly doth, doth: see do, v.] The third person singular of the present indicative of the verb do. See do.

doeskin (dō'skin), n. 1. The skin of a doe.—
2. A very close and compact woolen cloth, smoothly finished on the face, made for wearing-apparel, especially for men.
doef (dōf), v. [Early mod. E. also doffe; in 17th century sometimes printed doff; < ME. doffe, orig., in impv. (in which form the word first appears) dof, contr. of do of, inf. don of, put off: see do and off. Cf. don, dout, dup. Cf. E. dial. gawf (for goff), contr. of go off.] I. trans. 1. To put or take off, as dress, or any article of dress, especially the hat or cap.

Then to her he did doff his cap.
Robin Hood and the Tennyson's Daughter (Child's Ballads, IV. 336).

You have doffed our trust,
And made us doff our easy robes of peace.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 1.

Heaven's king who dofs himself our flesh to wear.
Crusoe.

Would I could doff my royal robes, and be One of the people who are ruled by me.
R. H. Stoddard, King's Bell.

St. To strip; uncover; lay bare.—St. To put or drive off; thrust aside or away.

Every day thou doff'st [at doff'st or doffest in most editions] me with some device.
Shak., Othello, iv. 2.

With their tails do sweep
The dewy grass, to doff the simpler sheep.
B. Johnson, Sad Shepherd, i. 2.

4. To throw, as something taken off or rejected; put or thrust so as to be out of the way.
[Rare.]

This need for a special organ, not included within the range of sensible Experience, is doffed aside.
G. H. Lewes, Proba. of Life and Mind, 1st ser., III.
[vii. § 84.]

5. In textile manuf.: (a) To strip off, as cotton or wool for spinning from the cards or cardingcylinder, etc. (see doffer); also, to remove or take away, as full bobbins, to make way for empty ones. (b) To mend or piece together, as broken threads.

II. intrans. To remove the hat from the head in salutation.

And feeding high, and living soft,
Grew plump and able-bodied;
Upon the grave obsequies doff'd,
The person smir'd and nodded.
Tennyson, The Goosie.

doffer (dōf'er), n. One who or that which doffs;
specifically, a revolving cylinder in a carding-machine, which doffs or strips off the cotton from the cards. See cut under carding-machine.

The doffers, who refused to pack yarn, are still making trouble.
Strikes of American Linen Co., New York Evening Post, [March 1, 1882.]

doffing-cylinder (dōf'ing-sil'in-dēr), n. A carded cylinder in a carding-machine for removing fibers from the teeth of the main cylinder.
doffing-knife (dōf'ing-nif), n. In a carding-machine, a steel blade with a finely toothed edge, which is reciprocated by a crank tangentially to the teeth of the doffer, for the purpose of taking off from it the carded wool which is collected into a sliver.

dog (dog or dōg), n. [Early mod. E. also dogg, dogge; < ME. dog, dogge, < AS. doğa (found only once, in a gloss, in gen. pl. doğena) = dog, mastiff; cf. (from LG. or E.) OF. and F.

dogue = Sp. dogo = Pg. dogue, dogue = It. dogo, a mastiff, bulldog; origin unknown. The general Teut. and Indo-European name for the dog appears in hound, q. v. Hence in comp.
bandog, bulldog, etc.] 1. A quadruped of the genus Canis, C. familiaris. The origin of the dog is a question most difficult of solution. Some think the breed is derived from the wolf, others affirm it to be from a familiarized jackal; all agree that no trace of it is to be found in a primitive state, the dhole of India and the dingoo of Australia being wild descendants from domesticated ancestors. The view now generally taken by naturalists is that the dog is neither a species, in the zoological sense, nor even the descendant of any one species modified by domestication, but that the dogs of different parts of the world have a correspondingly various ancestry, from different wild species of the genus Canis, as wolves, foxes, and jackals. This view is supported not only by the enormous differences between dogs, but also by the readiness with which nearly all dogs cross with their wild relatives; and, accordingly, the name Canis familiaris is a conventional rather than a proper zoological designation of the dog as a species. No satisfactory classification of the different kinds of dogs has been arrived at, what some naturalists regard as types being regarded by others as mere monogrels. An old classification grouped dogs in three classes, the Canes, Spines, and Pugnas. Colonel Hamilton Smith groups the domestic dog into six sections: (1) the wolf-dogs, including the Siberian, Eskimo, Newfoundland, Great St. Bernard, sheep-dog, etc.; (2) watch and estab- dog, including the German hound, Danish dog, dog of the North American Indians, etc.; (3) the greyhounds, in the diverse kinds of greyhound, Irish hound, pointer, Egyptian street-dog, etc.; (4) the hounds, as the bloodhound, staghound, ticklebarrier, beagle, pointer, setter, spaniel, springer, cocker, Blenheim dog, poodle, etc.;

(5) the cur, including the terrier and its allies; (6) the massifs, including the different kinds of mastiff, bulldog, pug-dog, etc. All these are artificial varieties, having comparatively little stability, their distinctive characters being soon lost by reversion to a more generalized type if they are left to interbreed. This tendency to reversion requires to be constantly counteracted by "artificial selection" at the hands of breeders, in order that the several strains may be kept pure, and their peculiarities be perpetuated along the desired lines of specialization. The best-bred dogs, of whatever kind, are those furthest removed from an original or common type of structure. The differences between dogs of all kinds are vastly greater than those found among individuals of any species in a state of nature; so great that, were they not known to be artificial, the dog would represent several different genera of the family Canidae, in different zoological classification. In fact, some genera, based upon actual and constant differences in the dental formula, have been named in order to signalize certain structural modifications which are found to exist, affording an example of the evolution of generic characters as well as of specific differences. These variations extend not only to size and general configuration, character of the pelage, and other outward features, but also to positive osteological and dental peculiarities, more marked probably than those of any other domesticated animals. The corresponding physiological and psychological differences are equally decided, as witnessed in the dispositions and temperaments of dogs, their comparitative docility, intelligence, etc., and consequently the uses to which they are or may be put. In the matter of size alone, for example, some toy dogs are tiny enough to stand easily on one of the fore paws of a large dog. Throughout the endless varieties, however, the influence of heredity is witnessed in the readiness with which dogs interbreed with one another, and cross with wolves, foxes, and jackals, bearing fertile progeny in all cases, and the readiness with which they revert to the wild state of their several ancestors. See the names of the several breeds. See also Canidae and Canis.

Now is a dogge also dere that in a dych lygge.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), II. 1792.

Many pretty ridiculous aspersions are cast upon dogges, so that it would make a dogge laugh to hear and understand them: as, I have heard a man say, I am as hot as a dogge, or, as cold as a dogge; I sweat like a dogge (when indeed a dogge never sweats); as drunk as a dogge; I swore like a dogge; and one said a man once that his wife was not to be believed, for she would ly like a dogge.
John Taylor, The Worlde Runnes on Wheels (Works, [1689], p. 282.)

He asks no angel's wings, no seraph's fire;
But thinks, admitted to that equal sky,
His faithful dog shall bear him company.
Pope, Essay on Man, l. 112.

2. In distinguishing sex, a male dog, as opposed to bitch; hence sometimes used in composition for the male of other animals, as in dog-fox, dog-ape.—3. pl. Canine quadrupeds in general; the family Canidae (which see).—4.
The prairie-dog. [Colloq., western U. S.]— 5. The dogfish. [Local, Eng.]—6. A mean, worthless fellow; a curish or sneaking scoundrel: applied in reproach or contempt.

A! dogs! the dewyll the drowne! York Plays, p. 82.

Whoever saw the like? what men have I?—
Dogs! cowards! dastards!—I would ne'er have fled,
But that they left me midst my enemies.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., l. 2.

7. A gay or rakish man, especially if young; a sport or gallant: applied, usually with an epithet (young, impudent, etc.), in mild or humorous reprobation.

I love the young dogs of this age. Johnson, in Boswell.

Here, sir, I give my daughter to you, who are the most impudent dog I ever saw in my life.
Shirley, St. Patrick's Day, II. 4.

8. In astron.: (a) [cap.] One of two ancient constellations lying south of the zodiac, known as Canis Major and Canis Minor. See Canis.
(b) The dog-star.

The burnt air, when the Dog reigns, is not fouler
Than thy contagious name.
Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, iv. 1.

9. A name of various mechanical devices, tools, and pieces of machinery. (a) pl. Androns:
specifically called fire-dogs.

Dogs for androns is still current in New England, and in Walter de Ribleworth I find chains glossed in the margin by androns. Lovell, Biglow Papers, Int.
(b) Same as dog-head, 1. (c) A sort of iron hook or bar, with one or more sharp fangs or claws at one end, which may be fastened into a piece of wood or other heavy article, for the purpose of moving it: used with various specific purposes. See cut, 4. An iron with fangs for fastening a log in a saw-pit or on the carriage of a saw-mill. 40 Any part of a machine which is a dog or clutch, or the carriage of a lathe, or an adjustable dog to change the revolution of a machine-tool. (1) pl. The set-screws which adjust the bed-tool of a planing-machine. (2) A grapple-jaw which lifts the monkey or hammer of a pile-driver. (3) A click or pallet to restrain the back-action of a ratchetwheel by engaging the teeth; a pawl. (4) pl. In ship-building, the final supports which are knocked aside when a ship is launched; a dophora. (5) In a lock, a tooth, prejection, tusk, or jag which acts as a detent. (6) A grab used to grasp well-tubes or tools, to withdraw them from bored, drilled, or driven wells. (7) pl. Nippers used in wire-drawing. They resemble carpenter's square pliers or pliers, and are sometimes closed by a sliding ring at the end of the strap or chain which slides down the handles of the nippers.—A dog's age, a comparatively long time;

as, I haven't seen him in a dog's age. [Colloq.]—A dog's death, a humiliating or disgraceful death, such as is inflicted upon a worthless or dangerous dog.

Let neither my father nor mother get wit
This dog's death I'm to die.
The Queen's Merit (Child's Ballads, III. 129).

A hair of the dog that bit him. See hair.—Burying-dog, the prairie-wolf or coyote, Canis latrans.—Curtal dog. See curtal.—Dalmatian dog, the coach-dog; an artificial breed of dogs, resembling the pointer in form and stature, but white in color, profusely spotted with black. It is trained to run under a vehicle, and is kept mainly as an appendage to an equipage, having little agacity, and being practically worthless for other purposes. Also called Dalmat dog.—Derry dog. See Derry.
—Dog Fo, Dog of Fo. See Fo.—Dog in the manger, a curious fellow who will neither use a thing himself nor let another use it, or who from mere perversity stands in the way of the interest or enjoyment of another without benefiting himself: referring to the fable of an ill-natured dog which, stationing himself in a horse's manger, will not let the horse eat the food in it, although he cannot eat it himself.—Dog out for the dog, a dog used in shooting. Such dogs, being well trained and obedient, were taken to typify humble or subservient people. Davies.

And seek to Januaries he goeth as lowe
As evers dide a dogge for the bowe.
Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 770.

Eskimo dog, one of a breed of dogs extensively spread over the northern regions of America and of eastern Asia.
It is rather heavier than the English pointer, but appears smaller on account of the shortness of its legs. It has oblique eyes, an elongated muzzle, and a bushy tail, which characteristics give it a wolfish appearance. The color is generally a deep dun, obscurely barred and patched with a darker color. It is the only beast of burden in arctic latitudes, and with a team of such dogs attached to his sledges the Eskimo can travel 60 miles a day for several successive days.—Field-dog, a dog used for the pursuit of game in the field. In the United States the term is commonly applied to pointers and setters.—Hunting-dog. (a) A dog used in hunting. (b) The patio (lyar), or greyhound.
See Lyones.—Mastiff dog, very small kind of spaniel with long silky hair, generally white, and with a round muzzle.—Newfoundland dog, a fine variety of the dog, supposed to be derived from Newfoundland, where it is employed in drawing sledges and little carriages laden with wood, fish, or other commodities. There are several varieties of this dog, the principal being a very large breed with broad muzzle, head carried well up, noble expression, wavy or curly hair, thick and bushy curled tail, black and white color. Another breed is smaller and almost entirely black. Some breeds seem to be crossed with hounds, mastiffs, etc. The Newfoundland dog is remarkable for its sagacity, patience, and good nature, and for its affection for its master. No dog excels it as a water-dog, its broad half-webbed paws making it an excellent and powerful swimmer.—Pouched dog, a marauding, thevical descendant of Thamnias. See Apes, 2, and servo-wolf.
—Fringed dog. See servo-wolf.—To ruin, cast and dogs. See cut.—To the dogs, to waste, ruin, perdition, etc.: used with give, go, sand, throw, etc.

Give not that which is holy unto the dogs. Mat. vii. 6.

Throw physic to the dogs, I'll none of it.
Shak., Macbeth, v. 2.

If that mischievous Até that has engaged the two most mighty monarchs in the world in a bloody war were sent to her place, i. e., to the dogs.

Bailly, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, p. 202.

dog (dog or dōg), v. t.; pret. and pp. dogged, pp.
dogging. [Early mod. E. dogge; < dog, n.] 1.
To follow like a dog; follow with or as with dogs, as in hunting with dogs; hunt; follow pertinaciously or maliciously; keep at the heels of; worry with importunity: as, to dog deer; to dog a person's footsteps.

We'll dog you, we'll follow you star off.
B. Johnson, Epilogue, II. 2.

I have been pursued, dogged, and waylaid.
Pope.
On your crests sit fear and shame,
And foul suspicion dog your name.
Scott, Robbery, II. 28.

This it is to dog the fashion: i. e., to follow the fashion at a distance, as a dog follows the heels of his master.
Whalley, Note to B. Johnson's Every Man out of his [Humour], II. 6.

2. To fasten, as a log by means of a dog (see dog, n., 9 (d)), for sawing.

When the log reached the carriage it was dogged, not with the old-fashioned lever dog driven by a mallet, but by the simple movement of a lever.
Engels, Art., XXXI. 225.

It has novel features of construction, and is particularly intended for dogging small ironing logs.
Art. Jour., II. 2, 171. 276.

2. Went, to grip, as a rope, to a spar or cable so that the parts bind on each other, to prevent slipping, and causing it to cling.

dogal (dō'gāl), a. [ML. dogale, var. (after It. doge, doge; see doge) of ducalle, dual: see ducal.] Belonging or pertaining to a doge. Mill-house.

dogana (dō-gā'nā), n. [It. = F. douane, custom, a custom-house: see douane, douan.] A custom-house.

dog-and-chain (dog'and-chān'), n. In coal-mining, a bent lever with a chain attached, by means of which props are withdrawn from the goaf without endangering the safety of the miner.

dog-age (dog'āp), n. A male ape.

If ever I thank any man, I'll thank you; but that they call compliment is like the encounter of two dog-apes.

Shak., As you like it, II. 5.

dogaresse (dō-gā-res's), n. [It., fem. < doge, doge.] The wife of a doge.

See-reliefs of the doge and the dogaresse kneeling at the feet of the enthroned Christ.

C. G. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 205.

dogate (dō-gāt), n. [= F. dogat = It. dogato, < ML. ducatus, ducatus, a duchy: see ducat, duchy.] The office or dignity of a doge. Also written dogests. E. D.

dog-bee (dog'bē), n. 1. A drone or male bee. — 2. A fly troublesome to dogs.

dog-belt (dog'belt), n. In coal-mining, a strong broad belt of leather to which a chain is attached, passing between the legs of the men drawing down or sledges in the low works. [Eng.]

dogberry (dog'ber'i), n.; pl. dogberries (-iz). 1. The berry of the dogwood, Cornus sanguinea.

— 2. In Nova Scotia, the mountain-ash, Pyrus Americana.

dogberry-tree (dog'ber'i-trē), n. 1. The dogwood. — 2. In the United States, the chokeberry, Pyrus arbutifolia.

dog-biscuit (dog'bis'kit), n. A kind of biscuit made with scraps of meat, for feeding dogs.

dogblow (dog'blō), n. In Nova Scotia, the ox-eye daisy, Chrysanthemum Leucanthemum.

dog-bolt (dog'bōlt), n. [Appar. < dog + bolt (obscure); a vague term of contempt. There is no basis of fact for the fanciful explanation of the word as "a corruption of AS. dolgbote [meaning dolgbōt, compensation for a wound] — dolg, a wound, and bote [meaning bōt, recompense; hence, a pettifogger who first provoked an assault and then sued for damages therefor."!] A fool; a butt; a term of contempt.

On me attendeth simple Sir John, (a chaplayne more meet to serve a thatcher, than in the church,) who is made a donkie and a dog-bolt by every serving-man.

Ulpian Fulwell, Am. Aduland, the Arts of Flatterer.

I have been fool'd and jaded, made a dog-bolt.

My daughter's run away. Fletcher, Pilgrim, III. 1.

O, ye dog-bolts!

That tear no hell but Dunkirk.

Beau. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, v. 1.

dog-brier (dog'brī'er), n. A brier, the dog-rose, Rosa canina.

dog-cart (dog'kāt), n. 1. A carriage with a box for holding sportmen's dogs; hence, a carriage for ordinary driving similar to a village cart, but with two transverse seats back to back, the second of which, as originally made, could be shut down, thus forming a box to hold dogs.

We have never yet satisfactorily discovered whether the dog-cart be an English or French invention, as it is common with both nations, where it is used for hunting as well as for pleasure-riding.

E. M. Straton, World on Wheels, p. 240.

2. A small cart made to be drawn by dogs.

dog-cheap (dog'chēp), a. [Early mod. E. also dog-cheape, dogge-cheape, dog-chape; < dog (as a type of worthlessness) (see dog, a., 6) + cheap, a. There is nothing to connect the word with dogger-cheap, q. v.] Very cheap; in little estimation.

W. B. (It.), v. 11, base, . . . good cheape, of little price, dogge cheape.

They afforded their wares so dog-cheape.

Stanhurst, Descrip. of Ireland, p. 22.

The nearest to the Chaucerian in virtue and wisdom is Trajan, who holds all the gods dog-cheap. Lander.

dog-collar, n. Dog's-bane. Paleografe.

dog-collar (dog'kol'ār), n. 1. A collar for a dog. — 2. An ornamental band or collar made of metal, beads, velvet, etc., and worn close round the throat by women.

dog-daisy (dog'dā'si), n. The field-daisy. [North. Eng.]

dog-days (dog'dāz), a. pl. A part of the year about the time of the heliacal rising of the dog-star. Various dates, from July 23 to August 12th, have been assigned for the first dog-day, and various durations, from 20 to 34 days. Pliny says they began with the heliacal rising of Procyon, which took place, he says, July 19th, B. C.; and this date has been widely accepted. But he also says the sun was then entering Leo, which rule, making the dog-days begin July 23d, has also been used. Hippocrates (460 B. C.) says they were in the hottest and most unhealthy part of summer. If the season was of Babylonian origin, it would originally probably have been in early summer. Perhaps they are now most usually reckoned from July 23 to August 12th, inclusive.

I should have look'd as soon for frost In the dog-days, or another inundation, As hop'd this strange conversion above miracle.

Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, III. 1.

I generally lay aside the dog-days and the hot time of the summer for the teaching of this part of the exercise.

Addison, The Fan Exercise.

dogdraw (dog'drā), n. In old Eng. forest law, an apprehension of an offender against the venison in the forest when he was found drawing after the deer by the scent of a led hound, especially after a deer which he had wounded with crossbow or longbow.

doge (dōj), n. [= F. doge = Sp. Pg. doge = D. G. Dan. Sw. doge, < It. doge, prop. dial. (Venetian) for duce, duce, It. usually duca (after MGr. dōkēs, acc. of dōfē), < L. dux (duo-), leader, duke: see duke.] The title of the chief magistrate of the old republics of Venice and Genoa. In Venice the office was established in the eighth century; the doge was chosen for life, at first by the citizens, but toward the end of the twelfth century the election was restricted to a small committee of the Great Council. The power and dignity of the doge were originally very great, but gradually became limited through the jealousy of the Venetian aristocracy. In Genoa the dignity was established in the fourteenth century; the doge was at first elected for life, but from the first part of the sixteenth century the term was restricted to two years, and the authority of the doge became more limited. The office disappeared in Venice in 1797, at the overthrow of the republic, and in Genoa in the same year, although there was a temporary restoration of it in the latter city a few years later.

dog-eared (dog'ērd), a. Having the corners of the leaves curled over and soiled by use, as a book. Also dog's-eared.

dogeste (dō'jēt), n. [< doge + -ate.] Same as dogate.

dogeship (dōj'ship), n. [< doge + -ship.] The office and dignity of a doge.

It is hard to acquit the Venetian commonwealth, under the dogeship of Giovanni Mocenigo, of risking the lasting interests of all Christendom, and of their Eastern dominion as part of it, to serve the momentary calls of a petty Italian policy. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 219.

dog-faced (dog'fāt), a. Same as dog-headed (a).

dog-fancier (dog'fan'si-ēr), n. One who breeds dogs and keeps them for sale.

dog-fennel, n. See dog's-fennel.

dogfish (dog'fish), n. 1. A name of various selachians and fishes belonging to widely distinct families. (a) The shark Squalus acanthias, of the family Squalidae or Spinacidae, having similar teeth in both jaws, of subquadrate form, with nearly horizontal cutting edges pointed outward, and with a spine in the front of each dorsal fin. It is the common dogfish of New England fishermen, and is often called piked dogfish by the English. It attains a length of from 1 to 2 feet, and is regarded as a pest, being very destructive to food-fishes. (b) A general name of sharks of the family Squalidae or Spinacidae. (c) A shark of the family Chimaeridae or Chimaeridae, as Mustelus sinensis, etc., having flattened teeth forming a pavement in both jaws, and unarmcd dorsal fins. (d) Any shark of the subfamily Mustelinae. (e) A shark of the family Isotrypa, as the spotted dogfish, Isotrypa punctatus, the rough skin of which is used by joiners and other artificers in polishing various substances, as wood. The small-spotted dogfish is a second species, Isotrypa punctatus. (f) A name of the mudfish, Ambloplites. (g) A name of Dallia pectoralis. See Dallia. Also called blackfish. (h) A kind of wrasse, Gobiodon caninus.

2. A name of the menobranchius or mud-puppy, Necturus maculatus, a batrachian reptile.

dog-fisher (dog'fish'er), n. One of the kinds of fish called dogfish.

The dog-fisher is good against the falling sickness.

I. Walton, Complete Angler.

dog-fly (dog'fi), n. [< ME. dogfly; < dog + fly.] A voracious biting fly, common in woods and bushes, and very troublesome to dogs. It somewhat resembles the black fly which infests cattle.

dog-footed (dog'fūt'ed), a. Digitigrade, with blunt non-retractile claws, as a dog; cynopodous: specifically applied to a division of the Viverridae: opposed to cat-footed or catopodous. J. E. Gray.

dog-fox (dog'foks), n. 1. A male fox.

The policy of those crafty swearing rascals—that stale old mouse-eaten dry cheese, Nestor, and that same dog-fox, Ulysses—is not proved worth a blackberry.

Shak., T. and C., v. 4.

2. A name of some small burrowing species of Vulpes, as the corsak, V. corsak, with reference to their resemblance to both the dog and the fox (which see). They inhabit the warmer portions of Asia and Africa. The American representative of the same group is the kit-fox, Vulpes velox. See kit under corsak.

dogged (dog'ed), a. [< ME. dogged, sullen, morose, dogglah; < dogged + -ed.] 1. Having the meaner qualities of a dog; malicious; mean; contemptible; surly.

How found thou that filthe in thi false will,

Of so dogged a dede in thi dert herf?

Deconstruction of Troy (R. E. T. S.), I. 1079a.

Arriving at Cheltenham, that dogged Nation was too well acquainted with our wants, refusing to trade, with as much scorn and insolency as they could express.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, I. 128.

2. Having the pertinacity of a dog; silently obstinate; unyielding.

You will find him [the barbel] a heavy and a dogged fish to be dealt withal.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, I. 14.

In the Presidency, as in the war, he [Grant] showed a tenacious, dogged will, and a certain massive force, which carried him far toward his ends.

G. S. Merriam, S. Bowles, II. 112.

dogged (dog'ed), adv. [< dogged, a.] Very: as, a dogged mean trick. [Prov. Eng., and colloq., U. S.]

doggedly (dog'ed-li), adv. [< ME. doggedly, doggetly; < dogged + -ly.] 1. In a dogged manner; with the pertinacity of a dog; persistently; unyieldingly.

He [Johnson] verified his own doctrine, that a man may always write well when he will set himself doggedly to it.

Boswell.

Of all stupidities there are few greater, and yet few in which we more doggedly persist, than this of estimating other men's conduct by the standard of our own feelings.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 224.

2. Badly; basely; shamefully. Grose. [Prov. Eng.]

doggedness (dog'ed-nes), n. The quality of being dogged; stubbornness; firm or sullen determination or obstinacy.

Now you are friendly.

Your doggedness and nigardizee flung from you,

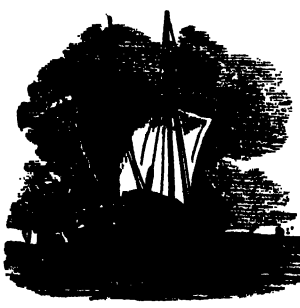

And now we will come to you.

Fletcher, Spanish Curate, IV. 7.

There was a churlish and unusual look about Rigby. It was as if malignant, and yet at the same time a little frightened, he had scrowed himself into doggedness.

Dickens, Coningsby, VIII. 2.

dogger (dog'ēr), n. [= Sp. dogre = G. dogger, < MD. doggher, D. dogger, also in comp. dogger-boot, MD. doggher-boot, also doggher-boot (boot = E. boat).] A Dutch fishing-vessel used in the North Sea, particularly in the cod- and herring-fisheries. It is rigged with two masts, and somewhat resembles a ketch.

dogger (dog'ér), n. [See also dogger: see below.] The term was introduced into English geology by Young and Bird in 1823. A sandy and oolitic limestone. The term Dogger Series, however, is generally taken to include not only the dogger proper, but the gray and yellow sands which underlie it. The Dogger Series rests upon the alum shale (Upper Lias) in Yorkshire, where dogger is a provincial word meaning a rounded stone, in allusion to the rounded appearance caused by atmospheric action on the large blocks into which the rock is divided by joints. The dogger is much worked for the iron ore which it contains. This name as used by Continental geologists is the equivalent of that part of the Jurassic series which corresponds to the Lower Oolite of the English geologists. It is the Brown Jura of the Germans, and is there divided into three groups, distinguished by their fossil remains. The entire series consists of many alternations of clays, marls, shales, and sandstones, frequently containing iron ore, as is the case in England.

doggerel (dog'ér-el), a. and n. [Sometimes written doggerl; < ME. dogerel, adj.; origin unknown. There is no obvious connection with dog; cf. dog-Latin.] I. a. An epithet originally given to a kind of loose, irregular measure in burlesque poetry, like that of "Hudibras," but now more generally applied to mean verses defective alike in sense and in rhythm.

"Now such a rym the devel I betoche!

This may wel be rym doggerel," quod he.

Chaucer, Prolog to Tale of Melibee, l. 7.

I confess the most part to be so rude, blunt, and harsh, and so full of tautologie (which I could not avoid), that they are not worthy to be accepted for verses or meters, but rather for rime doggerel.

T. Hall, Arithmetic (1600), Pref.

Two fools that . . . Shall live in spite of their own doggerel rhymes.

Dryden, Abs. and Absolt., ll. 411.

II. n. 1. Burlesque poetry, generally in irregular measure.

Doggerel like that of Hudibras. Addison, Spectator.

2. Mean, paltry verses, defective in sense and in rhythm.

The rhyming puffs of blacking, cosmetics, and quack medicines are well-known specimens of doggerel, which only the ignorant class style poetry.

W. Chambers.

The author of the Dialogues of Scaccario and the Latin biographer of Richard I. both run into what would be doggerel if it were not Latin, apparently out of the very gloom of their hearts and devotion to their subject-matter.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 152.

doggeralist (dog'ér-el-ist), n. [< doggerel + -ist.] A writer of doggerel. [Rare.]

The greatest modern doggeralist was John Wolcott, better known as Peter Pindar, whose satirical and scurrilous verses fill several volumes.

W. Chambers.

doggerelise (dog'ér-el-iz), v. i.; pret. and pp. doggerelised, ppr. doggerelizing. [< doggerel + -ize.] To write doggerel: as, to doggerelise for advertising purposes. E. D.

doggerelizer (dog'ér-el-iz-ér), n. One who doggerelises; a writer of mean rimes.

A sarcastical and ill-tempered doggerelizer.

Annals of Phil. and Penn., I. 178.

doggish (dog'ish), a. [< dog + -ish.] Like a dog; churlish; growling; snappish.

Or if we will be so vnordinate, and (with reverence be it spoken, without offence to God or man) so doggish and curish, one to another, the Lord lacketh not his dog-strikers to whip vs.

Foss, Martyrs, p. 17.

doggishly (dog'ish-li), adv. In a doggish manner; as a dog.

doggishness (dog'ish-ness), n. The quality of being doggish.

dog-gone, dog-on (dog'gón', -ón'), interj. [An allusive mitigation of the oath God damn.] A minced oath, used imperatively, equivalent to damn as a euphemism for damn. [Colloq. and low.]

dog-goned (dog'gón'd'), a. [See dog-gone.] Confounded; a minced epithet equivalent to damned as a euphemism for damned. [Colloq. and low, U. S.]

An' reckoned he warr't goin' to stan' no sech doggoned soon 'ay.

Lowell, Biglow Papers, 2d ser., p. 22.

But when that choir got up to sing I couldn't catch a word;

They sang the most dog-gondest thing

A body ever heard.

Will Carleton, Farm Ballads, p. 20.

Dolichus (dol'i-kas), n. [NL. (Bonelli, 1809), < Gr. dolichos, long.] A genus of ground-beetles, of the family Carabidae, containing, as at present restricted, the single south European species D. fasciatus. Five South African species were included by Dejourn, but were separated by Chaudoir and Lacordaire and placed in Cymindis.

Dolichid (dō-lī-d), n. A member of the Dolichidae.

Dolichus (dō-lī-d), n. pl. [NL., < Dolichus + -idae.] A family of tanioglossate siphonostomous gastropods. The animal is very large, and has a wide head, elongate distant tentacles, greatly developed cylindrical proboscis, and a very large foot, lobed and dilated in front and having a horizontal groove. The shell has a very large body-whorl, relieved by revolving ridges and corresponding grooves. The species are inhabitants of tropical seas. Some of them are known as tuna. See cut under Dolichus.

Dolman (dol'i-man), n. Same as doiman, 1.

Dolichid (dō-lī-d), n. A tunicate of the family Dolichidae.

Dolichidae (dol-i-ol'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dolichus + -idae.] A family of oceanic cyclomyarian ascidians, related to the salpa, represented by the genus Dolichus, and representing with some authors an order Cyclomyaria (which see) of compound tunicaries. They are transparent, Sexual Ascidiscoid of Dolichus dentatus, highly magnified.

free-swimming, eel-shaped organisms, moving by contracting the body and so squirting water out of one or the other end, developing by an alternation of generations, and provided with ciliated ribbon-shaped branchiae, dividing the respiratory cavity into two portions. The branchial lamellae are pierced with numerous slits. In sexual generation the ovaries and testes mature simultaneously.

Dolichum (dō-lī-ſum), n. [NL., dim. of L. dolium, a very large jar: see dolium.] The typical genus of the family Dolichidae. D. densicollatum and D. mülleri are examples.

dolite (dō-lī-t), n. [< Dolites (Krüger, 1823), < Dolium + -ites.] A fossil shell of the genus Dolium.

dolium (dō-lī-um), n. [NL., < L. dolium, a very large jar.] 1. Pl. dolia (-ſ). In Rom. antiq., a very large jar or vase of rough pottery, usually of approximately spherical form, used, like a cask at the present day, to contain wine, oil, and other liquids, as well as grain and other dry commodities. It was more anciently called calpar, and is equivalent to the Greek pitkos.—2. [cap.] The typical genus of gastropods of the family Dolichidae. Dolium galea is a leading species.

They are all characterized by a ventricose spirally furrowed shell, with a very small spire and an enormous aperture with crenate lip, and no operculum. They are known as tuna.
doll (dōl), n. [A general use of Doll, Dolly, a woman's name, an abbr. of Dorothea, < F. Dorothea, < L. Dorothea, < Gr. Dorothea, fem. of Dorotheos, lit. gift of God, < dōron, a gift (< didōnai, give: see dote), + theos, God. Theodora, fem. Theodora, is composed of the same elements reversed. Cf. doll.] A sweetheart; a mistress; a paramour; a doxy. Also dolly. [Old slang.]

doll (dōl), n. [In childish speech common also in the dim. form dolly; prob. a particular use of Doll, Dolly, a familiar dim. of the proper name Dorothea. See doll, and cf. dolly, dolly. Cf. also jack, as the name of a toy. The common explanation of doll as an abbr. of doll, doll, is certainly wrong. There is nothing to connect the word with that Fris. dolke, a wooden doll, dolke, doh, a doll: see duck.] A puppet representing a child, usually a little girl (but also sometimes a boy or a man, as a soldier, etc.), used as a toy by children, especially by girls.

Those who . . . live only to display a pretty face . . . can scarce rank higher than a painted doll.
 F. Knott, Essays, I. xxvii.

doll (dōl), n. [So.; origin obscure.] 1. Dung, especially of pigeons.—2. A large cake of sawdust mixed with dung, used for fuel. Jamieson. [Angus].—3. A large lump.

dollar (dōl'ar), n. [Early mod. E. also doller, doler, doller, daler; < MD. daler, D. daalder = LG. daler = Sw. 2. The monetary unit or standard of value of the United States and Canada, containing 100 cents, and equal to about 4s. 1½d. English. In the United States it is represented in the currency by gold and silver coins and by notes; in Canada by notes only. A two-dollar gold coin is current in Newfoundland. This unit was established in the United States under the confederation of the States, by resolution of Congress, July 6th, 1787. It was represented by a silver piece, the coinage of which was authorized by the act of Congress, August 8th, 1786, by which was also established the decimal system of coinage. The coinage was not begun until two years after the law of April 2d, 1792, establishing the mint. That law provided for the coinage of "dollars or units, each to be of the value of a Spanish milled dollar," as that coin was then current, and to contain 37½ grains of pure silver, or 416 grains of standard silver. The Spanish dollar above mentioned was that struck in Spanish America. Spanish-American dollars, and coins representing halves, quarters, eighths, and sixteenths of these (the last two known as centesimos and denarios in New York and some other States, and by other names elsewhere), were abundant in the United States during the latter part of the eighteenth and the first half of the nineteenth century. The Spanish dollar coined in Spain was rare, but the Spanish dollar of the two coins was the same. By an act of January 18th, and by other names elsewhere), were abundant in the United States during the latter part of the eighteenth and the first half of the nineteenth century. The Spanish dollar coined in Spain was rare, but the Spanish dollar of the two coins was the same. By an act of January 18th, 1877, the dollar was made to consist of 100 grains of silver, the quantity of pure silver remaining the same, 37½ grains. This dollar, being worth in market value from 140 to 200 cents, went out of circulation. An act of March 3d, 1875, directed the coinage of gold dollars of 25.8 grains of gold, 24.2 of silver, and 1.0 of copper, to be cut. From 1875 to 1877, this was the unit of value of the United States. The coinage of gold dollars was suspended by the act of September 26th, 1890. An act of February 25th, 1875, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver bullion, not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 per month, and cause it to be coined into standard silver dollars. This was repealed by the Sherman act of July 14th, 1890, which provided for the purchase of 4,000,000 ounces of silver each month and the coinage of 2,000,000 ounces a month. This act was repealed in 1892. The coins representing fractional parts of the dollar are: in silver, the half-dollar and quarter-dollar, or 50-cent and 25-cent pieces, and the dime or 10-cent piece; in nickel, the half-dime or 5-cent piece (originally in silver, and inconveniently small); and in bronze, the cent (originally in copper, and much larger) and the 2-cent piece. There is also a 3-cent piece, originally coined in silver and afterward in nickel, which has been little used owing to its inconvenient smallness in both forms. By the term dollar in the United States, notes is intended the coined dollar of the United States, a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold or silver, authorized as such by the stamp of the government. Sometimes abbreviated dol., but commonly represented by the symbol $ (the dollar-mark) before the number. See coinage table, under coinage.

The Almighty Dollar, that great object of universal devotion throughout our land, seems to have no genuine devotees in these peculiar villages.

Irving, The Crooks Village.

The Congress of 1792 fixed the monetary unit of the United States in coin, gave it the name Dollar, made it the unit of the money of account in their offices and courts, [and] named also its multiples and fractions.

dolma (dol'mā), n. [Turk. dolma, lit. stuffing, < dolmay, fill, stuff, become full.] A Turkish dish made of vine-leaves, egg-plant, gourds, etc., stuffed with rice and chopped meat.

dolman (dol'mān), n. [Also written, in first sense, dolman, formerly dollymant, < F. dolman (def. 1), dolman (def. 3) = G. dolman, dolman = Dan. Sw. dolman (def. 3) = Bohem. dolman = Russ. dolman, dolman = Bulg. Serv. dolma = Hung. dolmany, < Turk. dolama (def. 1).] 1. A long robe, open in front, and having narrow sleeves buttoned at the wrist, worn by the Turks over their other garments.—2. The uniform jacket of a hussar, richly ornamented with braid, and peculiar in that it is worn like a cloak with one or both sleeves hanging loose.—3. An outer garment worn by women, with a cape or hanging piece over the arm instead of a sleeve; a kind of mantle.

dolman (dol'men), n. [Also sometimes tolmen; = F. Sp. dolman, < Bret. dolmen, < dol, a table, + men = W. maen, a stone. Cf. W. tolmen, an omen-stone (jaen in comp. for maen, a stone).]

A structure consisting of one large unhewn stone resting on two or more unhewn stones placed erect in the earth: a term also frequently used as synonymous with  cromlech. The name is sometimes given also to structures where several blocks are raised upon pillars so as to form a sort of gallery. The most remarkable monument of this kind is probably that known as the Pierre Couverte, near Saumur, in France. It is 64 feet long, 14 feet wide, and about 8 feet high, and consists of four upright stones on each side, one at each end, and four on the top. The great stone of the dolmen represented in the accompanying cut is 25 feet long, 14 feet deep, and 14 feet across; it is estimated to weigh 150 tons, and is pointed on the points of two natural rocks. It is now generally believed that dolmens were sepulchres, although afterward they may have been used as altars. They are often placed within stone circles. The dolmen was probably a copy of a primitive rude dwelling, and may sometimes have been the actual structure in which the savage sheltered himself, converted afterward into his tomb. In several cases one of the stones is pierced with a hole. This is supposed to have been for the purpose of introducing food to the dead. Conclusions in regard to the original identity of various races have been based on the similarity of such structures in various parts of the world, as in Hindistan, Circassia, Algeria, and Europe; but too much importance may be attached to this, as the enclosed dolmen is simply the structure which savages of a very low type, of whatever race, would naturally erect for shelter. See cromlech and menhir.

dolmenic (dol-men'ik), a. [dolmen + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to dolmens.—2. Building dolmens.

The ethnological character and the migrations of the supposed dolmenic people.

N. Joly, Man before Metals (trans.), p. 155.

Dolomedes (dol-ō-mē'dēs), n. [NL., < Gr. dolomēdēs, wily, crafty, < dōlos, wile, craft, + mēdēs, in pl. mēdēs, counsels, plans, arts, cunning, < mēdōs, plan, plot, contrive.] A genus of citigrade spiders, of the family Lycoidea, or wolf-spiders. D. subreptilis is an example, and is one of the spiders which carry their eggs about in special webs.

dolomite (dol'ō-mīt), n. [Named from the French geologist Dolomieu (1750-1801).] 1. A native carbonate of calcium and magnesium, occurring as a crystallized mineral, and also on a large scale in white granular crystalline rock-masses, and then often called dolomite marble. The proportions of the carbonates vary from 1:1 to 1:3 or 1:5.—2. A rock consisting essentially of this mineral. It occurs in large masses in various regions, and especially in that of the upper Mississippi, where there are several members of the geological series which are at least two or three hundred feet thick, made up of dolomite in a remarkably pure form.

dolomitic (dol'ō-mīt'ik), a. [dolomite + -ic.] Containing dolomite: said of a limestone when it contains a considerable percentage of carbonate of magnesia, or of dolomite, intermixed with the more or less pure calcareous material of which limestone ordinarily consists.

dolomitization (dol'ō-mīt-i-kā'shōn), n. [dolomite + -ize + -shōn.] Conversion into dolomite, either partial or entire: a term used by geologists in discussing the origin of dolomite or its probable mode of formation from limestone. Also dolomitisation, dolomisation.

dolomitization (dol'ō-mīt-i-kā'shōn), n. Same as dolomitisation.

dolomise (dol'ō-mīs), v. t.; pret. and pp. dolomized, ppr. dolomizing. [dolomite + -ise.] To form into dolomite.

dolor, dolour (dō'lor), n. [ME. dolowr, dolor, < OF. dolor, dolour, dolour, F. douleur = Fr. Sp. dolor = It. dolore, < L. dolor, pain, smart, ache, grief, sorrow, < dolor = feel pain, grieve, sorrow: see dole.] 1. Pain; pang; suffering; distress.

head. It abounds in the Mediterranean and the temperate parts of the Atlantic, is an agile animal, and often follows ships in large herds, executing amusing gambols, describing semicircular curves which bring the blow-hole out of water to enable itself to breathe. A usual length is about 6 feet.

That even yet the Dolphin, which him [Arion] bore Through the Agæan seas from Pirates' view, Stood still by him astonished at his lore.

Spenser, F. Q., IV. xi. 23.

St. A general and popular name of fish of the family Coryphæna: so called from some confusion with the mammals of the same name. Species are Coryphæna hippurus, C. equisetis, etc., of an elongated antroform shape with a high protuberant forehead and very long dorsal fin, inhabiting the high seas of warm and temperate latitudes. They range up to 5 or 6 feet in length, and are remarkable for the change of color they undergo when taken out of the water. Also called dorsado. See cut under Coryphæna.

Parting day

Dies like the dolphin, whom each pang imbueth
With a new colour, as it gasps away,
The last still loveliest, till—'tis gone—and all is gray.

Byron, Childe Harold, IV. 20.

St. In Gr. antiq., a ponderous mass of lead or iron suspended from a special yard on a naval vessel, and, if opportunity presented, let fall into the hold of a hostile ship to sink her by breaking through her bottom.—4. Naut.: (a) A spar or buoy made fast to an anchor, and usually supplied with a ring to enable vessels to ride by it. (b) A mooring-post placed at the entrance of a dock. It is generally composed of a series of piles driven near to one another in a circle, and brought together and capped over at the top. The name is also sometimes applied to the mooring-post placed along a quay or wharf.

5. In early artillery, a handle cast solid on a cannon. Usually two of these were placed at the balancing-point, so that the gun would hang horizontal if suspended by them. They were commonly made in the conventional form of a dolphin; hence the name.

Domicella (Lorius domicella).

domicile, domicil (dom'i-sil), n. [= D. domicilis = G. Dan. Sw. domicil, < OF. domicelle, F. domicile = Pr. domicili = Sp. Pg. It. domicilio, < L. domicilium, a habitation, abode, < domus, a house (see dome), + *cilium, perhaps connected with cella, a cot, hut, cell, and celare, cover, hide: see cell, conceal.] 1. In general, a place of residence of a person or a family; in a narrower sense, the place where one lives; a place of habitual abode, in contradistinction to a place of temporary sojourn.

Let him have no culinary fire, no domicil; let him, when very hungry, go to the town for food.
Sir W. Jones, Ordinances of Menu, xii.

2. In law, the place where a person has his home, or his principal home, or where he has his family residence and personal place of business; that residence from which there is no present intention to remove, or to which there is a general intention to return. The domicile depends not on citizenship, nor on presence, but on the concurrence of two elements: 1st, residence in a place; and 2d, the intention of the person to make that place his home. Thus a man may be a citizen of one country, have his domicile in another, and temporarily reside in a third. Domicile is of three kinds: 1st, domicile of origin or nativity, depending on that of the parents at the time of birth; 2d, domicile of choice, which is voluntarily acquired by the party; and 3d, domicile by operation of law, as that of a wife arising from marriage. The term domicile is sometimes used to signify the length of residence required by the law of some countries for the purpose of establishing jurisdiction in civil actions; in Scotland, residence for at least forty days within the country constitutes a domicile as to jurisdiction. All questions relating to personal property, in matters of debt, intestacy, or testamentary disposition, are determined by the law of the place of domicile, while those relating to real property are subject to the law of the place where it is situated. The property of a foreigner domiciled in a country with which his own is at war is held to be subject to seizure as that of an alien enemy.

It would be more correct to say that that place is properly the domicile of a person in which his habitation is fixed without any present intention of removing therefrom.

Story, Conflict of Laws, iii. § 43.

"Two things must concur," says the same eminent jurist (Story), "to constitute domicile—first, residence, and secondly, intention of making it the home of the party," and when once domicile is acquired it is not shaken off by occasional absences for the sake of business or of pleasure, or even by visits to a former domicile or to one's native country.
Woolsey, Intro. to Inter. Law, § 67.

domicile (dom'i-sil), v. t.; pret. and pp. domiciled, ppr. domiciling. [= D. domicilieren = G. domicilieren = Dan. domicillere = Sw. domicillera, < F. domicilier = Sp. Wotton, Ekonomikastes, I.

2. Relating to Christ as Lord: as, the dominical prayer.

Some words altered in the dominical gospels. Fuller.
A, B, C, D, E, F, G, used in calendars to mark the Sundays throughout the year. The first seven days of the year being marked by the above letters in their order, the following seven and all consecutive sets of seven days to the end of the year are similarly marked, except that in leap-years the 24th and 25th of February receive the same letter: so that on whatever day the first Sunday of the year falls, the letter which marks it will mark all the other Sundays of the year, except in leap-year, when after February 24th the dominical letter for the remainder of the year changes to the one preceding. (Many modern writers make the change of letter to occur after the end of February, the 29th taking no letter.) After twenty-eight years the same letters return in their order. The use of the dominical letter is primarily to aid in determining the date of Easter; but it may be used, by calculation, for finding the day of the week on which a given date falls in any year, past or future. To find the dominical letter of any year, let p, q, r, s, respectively, be the digits in the thousands, hundreds, tens, and units' places of the number of the year. Then, if the year is in new style, find the sum  $6p + 2q + 5r + 4s + 1$ , and diminish it by the quotient of the year divided by 400 (neglecting the remainder). If it is old style, form the sum  $2p + 1$ ;  $q + 5r + 4s$ . In either case increase the result by double the remainder after dividing the year by 4 (this remainder being taken as 4 for January and February of a leap-year). Divide the result by 7, and the remainder is the ordinal number of the dominical letter in the alphabet (the ordinal number of G being called 0).

II. a. 1. The Lord's day; Sunday.—2. The Lord's house; a building used for religious service.

Then began Christian Churches, Oratories, or dominicals to outshine the Temples of the Heathen Gods.
Sp. Gaudens, Tears of the Church, p. 351.

3. A dominical letter.

Kath. Fair as a text B in a copy-book.
Ros. Ware pencils! How? let me not die your debtor, My red dominical, my golden letter. Shak., L. L. L., v. 2.

4. A garment or veil for Sundays. See dominical.

Wee decree that every woman, when the dooth communicate, have her dominical: if she have it not, let her not communicate until she have her dominical.

Sp. Jesuit, Reply to Harding, p. 72.

dominicale (dō-min-i-kāl), a. [ML.: see dominical.] A general term for a costume or a single garment appropriated to Sunday and attendance on divine service, especially a veil, of which the use is retained in Italy to the present day, and was common among Roman Catholics elsewhere until a recent date.

Dominican (dō-min-i-kān), a. and n. [= *F. dominicain = Sp. Pg. dominicano, dominico = It. domenicano (chiefly as a noun) = D. Dominikaan = G. Dominicaner = Dan. Sv. Dominikaner (as a noun), < ML. Dominicanus, pertaining to Dominicus, a Dominican, < Dominicus, a man's name, referring to Dominus de Gusman, called St. Dominic. The name Dominicus, E. Dominic, F. Dominique, Sp. Domingo, It. Domenico, means 'belonging to the Lord': see dominical.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to St. Dominic or the Dominicans.—2. Noting certain South American tanagers of the genus Paroaria, as P. ouallata, of dark-gray color with a pointed scarlet crest.*

II. n. One of an order of mendicant friars instituted by the Spaniard Domingo de Gusman in Languedoc in France, and confirmed by the pope in 1216. The official name of the order is Frater Predicatorum (rendered in English Friars Preachers, Preaching Brethren or Friars, Predicants, or Order of Preachers), preaching and instruction being the chief objects of its foundation. It was established by Dominic himself also in Italy and Spain, and spread rapidly in other countries. In England its members were called Black Friars, from their black cloths, and in France Jacobins, from the church and hospital of St. Jacques (Jacobus), in which they were first established in Paris. Their rules, based upon those of St. Augustine, enjoin poverty, chastity, fasting, and silence; but the last two may be dispensed with when they would interfere with active duties. The officers of the order are all elective. The highest holding his place six years, is termed general; provincial and conventual priors have charge respectively of provinces and convents. The Dominicans and Franciscans, originating about the same time and long vehement rivals, were the leading orders of the Roman Church until the rise of the Jesuits in the sixteenth century. They still exist in many countries, but with reduced influence. The dress of the order is a black mantle and a white habit and cap. An order of Dominican nuns was also founded by Dominic.

dominie (dom-i-ni or dō-mi-ni), n. [= Sp. domine, a schoolmaster, < L. domine, voc. of dominus, a lord or master; the word being formerly used in the vocative as a regular term of address to clergymen, schoolmasters, and others in authority.] 1. A schoolmaster; a pedagogue. [Scotch and Old Eng.]

The dainty dominie, the schoolmaster. Boss, and Ft. Abel Sampson, commonly called, from his occupation as a pedagogue, Dominie Sampson.

Scott, Guy Mannering, II.

2. In some parts of the United States, a clergyman; a parson; especially, a settled minister or pastor: a title used (generally in the Latin form domine) specifically in the (Dutch) Reformed Church, and colloquially in other churches, particularly in New York and New Jersey. dominio (dō-mē-ni-ō), n. [Sp.: see dominion.] In Mexican and Spanish law, equivalent to dominium.

dominion (dō-min-yōn), n. [< ME. dominion, domynyon, < OF. dominion (F. domination, as applied to the Dominion of Canada), < ML. dominio(-n-), equiv. to L. dominium (> Sp. Pg. It. dominio), lordship, right of ownership, < dominus, lord: see domain, domaine, domene, all from the same source.] 1. Lordship; sovereign or supreme authority; the power of governing and controlling; empire: as, a territory under the dominion of a foreign power.

It is also under the domynyon of the Venysians.

Sir R. Guyford, Pygmyrags, p. 10.

For till his dayes, the chiefe dominion
By strength was wielded without policy.

Spenser, P. Q., II. x. 25.

I praised and honoured him that liveth for ever, whose dominion is an everlasting dominion. Dan. IV. 34.

2. The right of uncontrolled possession, use, and disposal; power of control.

Study thou the dominion of thyself, and quiet thine own commotions. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., I. 24.

He could not have private dominion over that which was under the private dominion of another.

Locke.

What am I
That I dare to look her way:
Think I may hold dominion sweet,
Lord of the pulse that is lord of her breast?

3. A territory and people subject to a specific government or control; a domain: as, the dominions of Prussia.

Judah was his sanctuary, and Israel his dominion. Ps. cxxv. 2.

All they that dwell in that Donation, wherof the city is head.

I have seen now all the King of Great-Britain's Donation.

Youth, Manhood, Age, that draws us to the ground, . . . Glide to thy dim donations, and are bound.

Bryant, The Past.

See arm, 7 (a). — Dominion day, a national holiday observed in the Dominion of Canada on the first day of July, in celebration of the proclamation of the union of the provinces under that name on July 1st, 1867, in accordance with the act of the British Parliament, passed March 29th of that year, called the British North American Act. — Old Donation, a name popularly given to the State of Virginia.

And what more prolific mother of nobility was there in the eighteenth century than the Old Donation?

Scholar, Hist. U. S., I. 9.

— Syn. 1. Sovereignty, sway, contrivance, rule, mastery, ascendancy.

dominion (dō-min'i-um), n. [L., lordship, dominion; see dominion.] In civil law, the ownership of a thing, as opposed to a mere life interest, to an equitable right, to a merely possessory right, or to a right against a particular person.

Donation gives to him in whom it is vested the power of applying the subject to all purposes, except such as are inconsistent with his relative or absolute duties. Service gives the power of applying the subject only to exactly determined purposes.

Gordon Campbell, Roman Law, p. 251.

We cannot give a reason, other than mere chance, why power over a wife should have retained the name of manus, why power over a child should have obtained another name, potestas, why power over slaves and inanimate property should in later times be called dominium.

Mair, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 512.

Donation directum. (a) The legal title to land, as distinguished from the right to use it. (b) The right of the feudal lord in land, as distinguished from that of his vassal. (c) The right of the landlord in land, as distinguished from that of his tenant. — Donation utilis, the right of the beneficiary, vassal, or tenant in land, as distinguished respectively from the three meanings of donation directum. Donation directum and donation utilis, whether vested in the same person or not, together make up the ownership of the land in its widest sense.

domino (dom'i-nō), n.; pl. dominoes or dominoes (nōz). [= D. G. Dan. Sw. domino = F. domino = Sp. domino = Pg. It. domino, masquerade dress, < ML. domino (in sense 1), < L. dominus, lord, master, in ML. a title common to ecclesiastics (see dominic); cf. ML. dominicalis, a kind of veil. The game is said to be so called from the black under surface or part of the pieces with which it is played.] 1. (a) An ecclesiastical garment worn over other vestments in cold weather, made loose, and furnished with a hood.

(b) By restriction, the hood alone. — 2. A garment made in partial imitation of that described in def. 1, and used at masked balls. It is usually made of thin silk, loose, and with large sleeves and a hood.

4. A half-mask formerly worn over the face by ladies when traveling, at masquerades, etc., as a partial disguise for the features. — 5. One of the pieces with which the game of dominoes is played. See def. 6. — 6. pl. A game regularly played with twenty-eight flat oblong pieces of ivory, bone, or wood, usually black on one side, the back, and white on the other, the face, the latter being divided into two parts by a cross-line. The face of one domino, the double blank, is unmarked, and that of the others is marked on one or both ends with pipe or spots from one to six in number, the highest piece being the double six. Doninoes, however, are made in different styles, and for some games a larger number of pieces and higher markings are used. All play with dominoes consists in matching the pieces in a line by the corresponding ends so long as this can be done, and scoring the number of spots remaining in the beaten hand to the account of the winner.

The two players at dominoes glanced up from their game, as if to protest.

Diabola, Little Dorrit, I. 11.

dominotier (dom-mō-nō-ti-ā), n. [F. dominotier, a maker of dominoes (in def. 1, above); hence, by extension, as in def.; < domino, domino.] A maker of colored or marbled paper; an engraver or a colorer of woodcuts.

doole-tree (dōl'trē), n. [Sc., also written doole-tree; < dool = dole + tree.] In Scotland, a mourning-tree (see the extract). It resembled, as marking a place of mourning, the dun doole (the knoll of the tearful eye) of the Highlands, where the clan usually assembled to bewail any misfortune that befell the community.

The Earl of Camille fell at Flodden with many of his followers; and there is still to be seen, in front of the castle, a very large plane-tree, underneath whose melancholy boughs his sorrowing people are said to have spent several weeks in lamentations of their own and their country's calamity; for which reason it bears the appellation of the dole-tree. Land of Burns.

doom-palm (dōm'pām), n. A variety of palm, Hyphane Thebæa, remarkable, like other species of the genus, for having a repeatedly branched stem, each branch terminating in a tuft of large fan-shaped leaves. The fruit is about the size of an apple; it has a fibrous, meaty rind, which tastes like gingerbread (whence the name gingerbread-tree, sometimes applied to this palm), and is eaten by the poorer inhabitants of the places where it grows. An infusion of the rind is also used as a beverage, being cooling, slightly aperient, and beneficial in fever. The seeds are berry, and are made into small ornaments.
Hyphane is native of the shores of the Red Sea. The doom-palm is a native of Upper Egypt and the central parts of Africa, and is some districts some whole dooms. Also spelled doom-palm.

Doon-palm (Hyphomayrha).

dooms (dōms), adv. [Altered toward doom, by way of explaining an obscure word, from dooms, doomsis, dumes, doon, dome, dayn, also doonkins (-ins = E. -ing), very, in a great degree, Ice. dōndis, rather, pretty (adv.), a prefix to adjectives and adverbs. < dā, very, prob. orig. 3. [esp.] The Doomsday Book (see below), or a record similar to it, as the Exon Doomsday, contemporary with it, preserved in Exeter cathedral.

A Doomsday of the conquerors was drawn up in the dual hall at Lillebonne, a forerunner of the great Doomsday of the conquerors.
E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, III. 300.

Doomsday Book (written archaically Domesday Book, < ME. Domesdæle Book, etc., so called because its decision was regarded as final, a book containing a digest, in Norman French, of the results of a census or survey of England undertaken by order of William the Conqueror, and completed in 1086. It consists of two volumes in vellum, a large folio containing 822 pages, and a quarto containing 465. They form a valuable record of the ownership, extent, and value of the lands of England (1) at the time of the survey, (2) at the date of bestowal when they had been granted by the king, and (3) at the time of Edward the Confessor, when a somewhat similar survey had been made; the numbers of tenants and dependents, amount of live stock, etc., were also returned. The book was long kept under three different locks in the Exchequer, along with the king's seal, but is now kept in the Public Record Office. In 1783 a facsimile edition printed from types made for the purpose was issued by the British government. The counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham were not included in the survey. There existed also local doomsday books.

doomsman (dōms'man), n. [ME. domesman, domesmen, domesmon, a judge, < domes, gen. of dom, judgment, + man.] A judge; an umpire.

For counteth he no kynges writthe than he in courte sitteth.
To dom as a domes-man. Piers Plowman (B), xix. 302.

Nowe sir, ye muste presentis this boy unto sir Pilate,

York Plays, p. 287.

doomsster (dōm'stēr), n. [Early mod. E. also doomsster; < doom + -ster. Another form is doomsster, doomsster, q. v.] One who pronounces doom or judgment; in Scotland, formerly, the public executioner. In the case of a capital conviction in the Court of Justiciary, the doom or sentence was repeated by the executioner in the judge's words, with the addition, "This I pronounce for doom."

Repeating after the Clerk of Court, he gabbed over the words of the sentence, which condemned Euphemia Deane to be . . . conveyed to the common place of execution, and there hanged by the neck upon a gibbet. "And this," said the Doomsster, aggravating his harsh voice, "I pronounce for doom." Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xiv.

doon (dōn), n. [Sinhalese name.] A large tree of Ceylon, Doona Zeylanica, of the natural order Dipterocarpaceae. The timber is much used for building, and the tree also yields a resin which is made into varnish.

doon (dōn), adv. and prep. A Scotch form of down.

ing a square sail, employed for navigating the marshes and the branches of the mouth of the Ganges. The doongas are used chiefly in obtaining salt.

door (dōr), n. [Early mod. E. also doore, dore; in earlier speech the word appears in two forms more or less mixed: (1) ME. dore, dor, < AS. dor (gen. dores, pl. dor), OS. dor = OFries. dore = MLG. dor = LG. door = OHG. MHG. tor, G. thor = Goth. dāur, all neut.; (2) ME. durr, dūr, < AS. dūra (gen. dūra, pl. dūra, dūra) (also rarely nom. dūra, gen. and pl. dūran) = OS. dūra = OFries. dūro = D. dūr = MLG. dūre = LG. dūre = OHG. tūri, pl., also sing., MHG. tūr, G. thūr = Ice. dyrr, pl., = Sw. dōrr = Dan. dōr = Goth. dāwrona, pl., a door, all fem. (Dan. common) except the Ice., which is also neut.; all orig. pl. The common Teut. form is **dūr* = Gr. θύρα = L. foris, usually in pl., foris (> ult. foris, forum, foraneous, foreign, etc.), = *Ir. In another view, referred to Skt. yām, move quickly, shake, fan (a fire), = Gr. θύω, rush, storm, as the wind, being thus orig. (like windows, q. v.) a passage for the air or wind.] 1. A movable barrier of wood, metal, stone, or other material, consisting sometimes of one piece, but generally of several pieces framed together, commonly placed on hinges, for closing a passage into a building, room, or other inclosure. In antiquity, as in China and other Eastern countries at the present day, doors often swung on pivots projecting into sockets above and below. Modern carpenters' doors are classified in general as batten-doors and panel-doors. Batten-doors are formed of two or more boards placed longitudinally side by side, and held together by two or more transverse rails. Panel-doors are formed of a skeleton framework called a door-frame, of which the openings are filled with pieces of stuff called panels, which are usually cut from thinner boards than the framework. If the panels are wider than they are high, they are called lying panels; if longer than wide, they are called standing panels.

A. Batten-door. B. Panel-door: a, top rail; A, middle rail or lock-rail; c, bottom rail; d, batten; e, lock-stile; f, muntin; g, panel.

At last he came unto an yron door
That fast was lockt. Sponser, F. Q., l. viii. 57.
The threshold grates the door to have him heard.
Shak., Lucres, l. 300.

2. An opening for passage into or out of a building or any apartment of it, or any inclosure; a doorway.

When he entered in to the Chapelle, that was but a lytillie and a low thing, and had but a lly! Dore and a low, then the Entree began to wate so gret and so large and so high as though it had ben of a gret Mynstre, or the gate of a Fahey. Manderlyle, Travels, p. 120.

'Tis not so deep as a well, nor so wide as a church door;
but 'tis enough, 'twill serve. Shak., R. and J., III. 1.

Hence—3. An exterior or public entrance-way, or the house or apartment to which it leads.

Martin's office is now the second door in the street.

Arbuthnot.

4. Avenue; passage; means of approach or access, or of exit: commonly in figurative uses: as, the door of reconciliation; a door of escape.

But I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost. For a great door and effectual is opened unto me. 1 Cor. xvi. 9.

Blank door, a filled-up door-space in a wall, with a ceiling and dressing like those of a door, made for ornament or symmetry of appearance.—Bullhead door. See bull-head.—Center of a door. See center.—Chalking of a door, in Scotland, a warning to tenants of urban tenements to move, given by having the principal door of the house chalked, forty days before Whit-tide, by a town officer, acting at the desire of the proprietor, and without written authority from the magistrate.—Deaf as a door. See deaf.—Death's door. See death.—Double door, an entrance-door made like a folding door with two leaves.—Folding door, a door between apartments, generally with two leaves, but sometimes with four (two hinged together on each side, so that one of each pair will fold back against its mate), one half of the door having bolts at top and bottom to hold it closed, the two halves closing together at the center, and each half when fully opened folding back against the adjacent parallel line of wall or door-space. Sometimes confounded with sliding door (which see, below).—Ledged door, a deal door strengthened by cross-pieces at the back.—Letters of open doors. See open.—Next door to, (a) In the house next adjacent to. (b) Near to; bordering on; very nearly.

A riot unpunished is but next door to a tumult.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

Out of doors. (a) Out of the house; in the open air; abroad.

Look you; I'll turn you out o' doors, and scorn you.

Fletcher and Rowley, Maid in the Mill, III. 2.

(b) Hence, figuratively, quite gone; no more to be found; lost; irrelevant.

His imaginary title of fatherhood is out of doors. Locke.

These controversies about the four elements and their manner of mixture are quite out of doors in their philosophy. Boyle, Origin of Forms.

Overhung door, a door supported from above, as in some forms of sliding barn- and car-doors.—Sliding door, a door consisting either of one or of two leaves made so as to slide in a direct line in opening or closing it. A sliding door between apartments in a dwelling-house usually has two leaves, each of which slides back on shelves into an open space confounded in the partition. Sometimes, in the latter case worked with folding door (which see, above).—The angelic door or gate, in some Byzantine churches, a door which seems to have connected the nave with the choir, when the latter was separated by a partition from the rest of the body of the church. J. M. Neale.—The holy doors, in Greek churches, the central door of the iconostasis, giving access to the bema or sanctuary from the choir (if that forms a separate division of the building) or from the body of the church. Sometimes also called the royal doors, a name properly belonging to the doors of the narthex. The holy doors are open only at the commencement of great vespers, at the entrances (great and little) in the liturgy and vespers, and from the invitation of the priest to the communicants to approach till the close of the liturgy. See cut under bema.—The royal doors or gates, in Greek churches, strictly, the doors leading from the narthex into the body of the church; also called the silver doors or gates, because in the church of St. Sophia they were made of silver. The name royal gates is also frequently given to the outer doors of the church leading into the narthex from the porch or pro-narthex, and properly distinguished as the bronze or iron gates; and some writers even use the term royal doors as a name of the holy doors of the bema.—To darken one's door. See darken.—To lie or be at one's door, figuratively, to be imputable or chargeable to one.

If I have failed, the fault lies wholly at my door.
Dryden, tr. of Dufrenoy's Art of Painting, Pref.

Lady Clara Vere de Vere.

Nitton, Hist. Moscovia, v.

door-jamb (dôr'jam), n. See jamb.

doorkeeper (dôr'kê'për), n. 1. One who guards the door or entrance of a house or an apartment, and admits persons entitled to admittance; a janitor.

I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness. Ps. lxxiv. 10.

2. In the early church and in the Roman Catholic Church, same as ostiarium.

door-knob (dôr'nob), n. The bulb or handle on a door-lock spindle, by which the door is opened.

door-knocker (dôr'nok'er), n. Same as knocker.

The visitor will certainly be sent to see a door-knocker in a house in one of the streets on the western slope.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 215.

door-latch (dôr'laeh), n. An attachment to a door by which it is kept closed. It is either a latch in the typical form, or a spring-bolt in a case of metal having a spindle with knobs by which the bolt is released from a keeper on the door-post.

door-mat (dôr'mat), n. A heavy mat made of hemp, flax, or jute, woven or tied, or of sedge, straw, rushes, etc., or sometimes of caoutchouc, placed before a door for use in cleaning the shoes by those entering.

door-nail (dôr'nâl), n. [< ME. dorenail, dornayl; < door + nail]. A large nail or stud fixed in a door to receive the blow of a knocker of simple form.—Dead as a door-nail. See dead.

door-piece (dôr'pês), n. In a Cornish pump-lift, the valve-chamber of the pump. It is a section in which there is a door that can be taken away when it is necessary to examine the valve and seat, or to make repairs.

door-pin (dôr'pin), n. A pin or catch used to fasten the door of a freight-car.

door-plate (dôr'plâs), n. Same as doorway.

I went up the hill to the west, opposite to the end of the vale of Hinnom, and saw a great number of sepulchral grots cut out of the rock, many of which have beautiful door-plates.

Poole, Description of the East, II, 25.

door-plate (dôr'plât), n. A plate of metal or other material on the door of a house or room, bearing the name and sometimes the business of the occupant.

door-post (dôr'pöst), n. The post, jamb, or side-piece of a door.

And thou shalt write them [my words] upon the door posts of thine house, and upon thy gates. Deut. xi. 20.

door-pull (dôr'pûl), n. A handle used for opening or shutting a door.

door-shaft (dôr'shâft), n. A revolving iron shaft extending from the front platform to the rear door of a street-car having no conductor, by means of which the driver can open or close the door.

doorshek (dôr'shek), n. The prayer-carpet used by Mohammedans. See prayer-rug.

door-sill (dôr'sil), n. The sill or threshold of a doorway.

Doorsill there was none, but a perennial passage for the hens under the door board. Thoreau, Walden, p. 47.

door-spring (dôr'spring), n. An apparatus for automatically closing a door. Door-springs are made in a great variety of forms, and act by means of coiled, twisted, or curved wire, or by elastic bands, or air-compressing appliances, which store the power spent in opening the door and apply it to close and latch it.

doorstead (dôr'sted), n. The entrance of or parts about a door; a doorway.

Did nobody clog up the king's doorstead more than I, there would be room for all honest men.

Warrington, To Hurd, Letter cxi.

door-step (dôr'step), n. The step of a door; the threshold.

She set her foot on her door step.

A bonny marble stone.

Lord William (Child's Ballads, III, 20).

door-stone (dôr'stôn), n. The stone at the threshold; the step-stone.

They darstna' on any errand whatsoever gang over the door-stone after gloaming.

Scott.

door-stop (dôr'stop), n. 1. A flange against which a door shuts in its frame.—2. A device placed behind a door to prevent it from being opened too widely.

door-strap (dôr'strap), n. In some street-cars having no conductor, a cord or strap by which the driver can close the rear door.

door-strip (dôr'strip), n. A border or weather-guard affixed to the edge of a door, and arranged to fit tightly against the casing when the door is closed.

door-tree (dôr'trê), n. [< ME. doretre (= Dan. dōrtre = Sw. dörrtræ); < door + tree]. The side-piece or jamb of a door; the door-post.—Dead as a door-tree. Same as door-nail (which see, under dead).

For James the gentle lugged in his bokes, That faith with-out the false is right no thinge worth, And as dead as a door-tree but gif the doles solve.

Piers Plowman (B), l. 125.

doorway (dôr'wâ), n. In arch., the passage of a door; the entrance-way into a room or building. Doorways exhibit the characteristics of the different classes of architecture in which they are used. In classical architecture and during the middle ages much attention was bestowed upon the design and ornamentation of entrances, particularly those of churches and other public buildings. In all good architecture the chief doorway of a building is treated as a very important feature, and is made of size and dignity corresponding with the facade of which it is a part and the interior to which it gives access.

The Polynesian races soon learnt to adopt for their doorways the more pleasing curvilinear form with which they were already familiar from their interior.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I, 282.

There are no flying buttresses, no pinnacles, no deep and fretted doorways, such as form the charm of French and English architecture.

J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 44.

doorway-plane (dôr'wâ-plân), n. In arch., a space between the open passage or the doorway proper and the larger arch within which it is placed. This space is frequently richly adorned with sculpture, especially in medieval architecture.

doorweed (dôr'wêd), n. The Polygonum aviculare, a common low weed in yards, pathways, and waste places.

door-yard (dôr'yârd), n. A yard about the door of a house.

On either side [of the road] stand the houses, with little green lawns in front, called in rustic phrase "door-yards."

J. Fleck, Amer. Fol. Assoc., p. 20.

doosootie (dô-sô'tî), n. [Hind. doosât], a coarse cloth made of double threads, < do, du [< Skt. dvi = E. two], + sât, thread, < Skt. √ sâ = E.

see]. Cotton cloth used for tents and other things requiring strong material, from Agre in northern India. Also doosootie.

dopp (dop), v. t. [*< ME. *doppen* (only as in deriv. dop), n. l. dopper, < AS. dōppetan, dip, dive, as a bird into water, *< *dōpan*, pp. of **dōpan*, the formal source of dōpan, dip, + -etan, verb-formative: see dip, and cf. dop, n. l. dopper. Cf. also OFism. dōppen, var. of dōpen = MD. dopen, D. dōpen = MLG. dopen, etc., dip, baptize: see dope, n.] To dip or dunk.

So was he dight,
That no man might Hym for a freze deny,
He dopped and dooked,
He spake and looked,
So religiously.

Sir T. More, A Merry Jest.

Like tonny-fish they be which swiftly dive and dop.
North, tr. of Plautus.

dop (dop), n. l. [< ME. dōppe, a water-bird, dipper, diver, < AS. dōppa (in a gloss, "funix [fulix, coot], gonot [gannet] vel dōppa, euid [duck]"), Wright's AS. Vocab., ed. Hy plunten doune, as a dōppe, in the water.
King Alisunder, l. 5776 (Weber's Metr. Rom., I.).

dop (dop), n. 2 [< dop, v.] A very low bow.

The Venetian dop, this.

R. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 2.

dop (dop), n. [Also written dopper; < D. dop, MD. dop, dōppe = MLG. dop, dōppe, abell, husk, cover.] In diamond-cutting, the instrument into which the diamond to be polished is soldered by means of a fusible metal. It consists of a bowl to receive the diamond and molten metal, and a round iron stem, which is held by the tong.

dop-chicken (dop'chik'en), n. [Same as **dop-chick*, which is found only in the altered forms dobchick, dabochick, < dop, v., + chick or chicken: see dop, n. l. and dabochick.] Same as dabochick, 3. [Prov. Eng. (Lincolnshire).]

dope (dop), n. [< D. doop, sauce, dip, baptism, < dōpen, dip, baptize: see dip, and cf. dop, n. l. dopper]. 1. Any thick liquid, as a thick sauce, thick gruel, or other semi-fluid or pasty thing for eating. Specifically.—2. A thick pasty lubricant; specifically, axle-grease.

"Dope," a preparation of pitch, tallow, and other ingredients, which, being applied to the bottom of the shoes, enables the wearer to lightly glide over snow softened by the rays of the sun.

Sci. Amer. Supp., XXII, 9352.

3. Any absorbent material, as cotton-waste or sand, used to absorb and hold a lubricant or other liquid. Thus, cotton-waste is used as dope on railroads around the axles of the wheels to hold the oil used for lubrication; and in the manufacture of dynamite sand is used to hold the nitroglycerin.

dopper, n. Same as dopper, 2.

dopper (dop'er), n. [ME. dopper, spelled dopper, a water-fowl, diddapper (see diddapper, dōpe-dopper, diddapper, ME. dōdapper, etc., orig. dōpe + dopper), < dōppe, dip: see dop, n. l.] 1. A diving bird; a didapper.

2. A dipper: in contempt for an Anabaptist. [Cf. Dipper, 2.] Also doper.

Past. Have you doppers?
2 Hor. A word of doppers! but they are there as lunatic persons, walkers only; that have leave only to hear and ha, not daring to prophesy, or start up upon stools to raise doctrine.
B. Jonson, News from the New World.

dopper-bird (dop'er-bêrd), n. The dabchick or didapper. Hallwell.

doppia (dop'pîa), n. [It., fem. of doppio = F. double, > E. double: see double. Cf. dobla, dobra.] A former Italian gold coin; a pistole. The doppia of Piedmont was equal to 22.75 in American gold, that of Rome 22.57, that of Lucca 22.57, that of Milan 22.61, that of Venice 22.07, that of Malta 24.02, and that of the island of Sicily 25.02.

doppietta (dop-pîet'îa), n. [It. dial. dim. of doppia: see doppia.] A former gold coin of the island of Sardinia, worth $1.90 in American gold.

dopping (dop'ing), n. [Verbal n. of dop, v.] Literally, a dipping or dunking; specifically, in falconsy, a number of sheldrakes together.

A dopping of sheldrakes.
Scott, Sports and Pastimes, p. 22.

dopulenta (dop'lu-nt), n. [Named by Haidinger for the German physician Christian Doppler (1803-54).] A substance derived from the maceration of peat or other vegetable matter. It is soft and elastic when freshly obtained, but loses two thirds of its weight of water when dried at the ordinary temperature of the air, and then has nearly the composition of cellulose. When thoroughly dry it is brittle, and has a vitreous lustre and a diagonal conchoidal fracture. It is found in many localities in peat-bogs, and associated with lignite. It is one of the varieties of fossil vegetable matter called by the Germans Fossilholz (fossil-wood).

doputia (dop'pu-ti'), n. [Also doputia; < Hind. doputia, doputia (cerebral ?), a kind of shawl or wrapper, lit. having two breadths, < do, du (< Skt. dvi = E. two), + put, a breadth.] In India, a wide piece of stuff, worn as a shawl, without cutting or sewing. It is the principal garment of women of the lower orders.

dor<sup>1</sup>, dor<sup>2</sup> (dôr), n. [Early mod. E. also dorre, dor, dor, and in comp. sometimes dor; < M.E. dore (not found), < A.S. dora, a humblebee, bumblebee (A.S. also feld-bod, 'field-bee'); cf. mod. comp. dumbledore, a bumblebee, also a beetle or cockchafer. Origin unknown.] 1. A lamellicorn beetle of the family Scarabæidae, a species of dung-beetle, Geotrupes stercorarius. It is one of the commonest British beetles, less than an inch long, black with a metallic reflection, and is often heard droning through the air toward the close of the summer twilight. Also called dor-beetle, sometimes dor-fly, and provincially in England buzzard-cloak.

What should I care what every dor doth bus
In credulous ears?

St. A drone (bee).

There is a great number of gentlemen which cannot be content to live idle themselves, lyke dorres, of yat which other have laboured for.

Sir F. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), ed. Arber, p. 38.

3. The cockchafer, Melolontha vulgaris. [Prov. Eng.] Also dor-beetle.—4. One of several ground-beetles, species of the family Carabidae and genus Harpalus. More fully called black dor. Kirby.

dor<sup>2</sup>, dor<sup>2</sup> (dôr), v. t.; pret. and pp. dorred, dorring. [Early mod. E. also dorre; appar. < dor<sup>1</sup>, dor<sup>1</sup>, a beetle, in the same way as hum, humbug, hoax, < hum, buzz; but cf. foel. dôri = Dan. daare = Sw. dåre, a fool, Dan. be-dåre = Sw. dåra, befool, infatuate, delude; see dare<sup>2</sup>. The G. thor, MHG. tôre, tôr, is a different word, connected with E. daisy.] To hoax; humbug; make a fool of; perplex.

Abroad with Thomas? Oh, that villain dor me;
He hath discovered all unto my wife.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iv.

When we are so easily dorred and amazed with every sophism, it is a certain argument of great defect of inward furniture and worth.

Hale, Sermon on 2 Pet. iii. 16.

To dor the dottenel, to humbug a simpleton.

Here he comes, whistle; be this sport called dorring the dottenel!

B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, iv. 1.

dor<sup>2</sup>, dor<sup>2</sup> (dôr), n. [< dor<sup>2</sup>, dor<sup>2</sup>, v.] 1. A trick; a practical joke.

My love was fool'd, time number'd to no end
My expectation flouted; and guess you, sir,
What dor unto a doting maid this was,
What a base breaking-off!

Fletcher (and another), Love's Pilgrimage, iii. 2.

Now trust me not, Readers, if I be not already weary of punning and fooling this beagull, so open he lies to strokes; and never offers at another, but brings home the dor upon himself. Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

2. A practical joker.

This night's sport,
Which our court dor so heartily intend.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 1.

3. A fool. Hawkins, iii. 109 (in Halliwell).—To give one the dor, to make a fool of one.

He follows the fallacy, comes out accounted to his beloved instructions; your mistress smiles, and you give dor the dor.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 1.

Doradina (dor-a-di-nâ), n. pl. [NL., < Doras (-rad-) + -ina.] In Günther's system of classification, a group of Siluridae with the rayed dorsal fin developed and the anterior and posterior nostrils remote from each other. It includes the Doradinae and other forms.

Doradinae (dor-a-di-nâ), n. pl. [NL., < Doras (-rad-) + -inae.] A subfamily of silurid fishes with the gill-membrane confluent with the skin below, the nostrils remote, and a lateral row of bony plates. It includes about 40 South American fresh-water species.

doradina (dor-a-din), n. Of or relating to the Doradinae.

(Haeckel, 1893), < Dorastaspis + -ida.] A family of acantharian radiolarians, typified by the genus Dorastaspis. They have a simple spherical lattice-shell, composed of the branched apophyses of 20 equal radial spines meeting in its center. Properly written Dorastaspida.

The family Dorastaspida is the most important family of the Acanthophracta, or of those Acantharia in which the radial spines are connected by a complete extra-capsular lattice-shell.

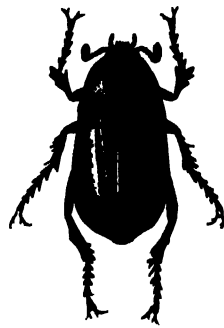

Haeckel, Radiolaria of Challenger, p. 802.

Dorastaspis (dor-a-tas'pi-ds), n. pl. [NL., < Dorastaspis + -ida.] Same as Dorastaspida, and the preferable form of the name.

Dorastapids (dor-a-tas-pid'i-ds), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Dorastaspida. Dorastaspis (dor-a-tas'pis), n. [NL. (Haeckel, 1893), < Gr. dôra, spear, + dorik, shield.] A genus of radiolarians, typical of the family Dorastaspida.

dor-bug, dor-bug (dôr'bug), n. 1. The cockchafer of Europe, Melolontha vulgaris.—2. In the United States, the popular name of several species of the genus Lachnosterna, of which there are altogether about 75. The commonest is L. fusca, abundant in the months of May and June, hence sharing with some related beetles the name of June-bug. It is a stout beetle, about an inch long, of a dark brown color, with comparatively long, slender legs, and hooked claws, and well known from its habit of entering lighted rooms at night with a loud buzzing noise. These beetles feed upon the Dorian (dô-ri-an), a. and n. [< L. Dorius, equiv. to Doricus, < Gr. dôpous, dôpous, Dorian, Doric, pertaining to Doris, L. Doris, Gr. dôpous, or to the Dorians, L. Dores, Gr. dôpous, eponym. dôpous, Dorus.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to Doris, a small district of ancient Greece, lying south of Thessaly and northwest of Phocis; relating to or originating with the inhabitants of Doris.—2. Of or pertaining to the Doric race; Doric.

There shalt thou hear and learn the secret power
Of harmony, in tones and numbers hit
By voice or hand; and various-measured verse, Æolian charms and Dorian lyric odes.

Milton, P. R., iv. 287.

Dorian chiton, mode, etc. See the nouns.

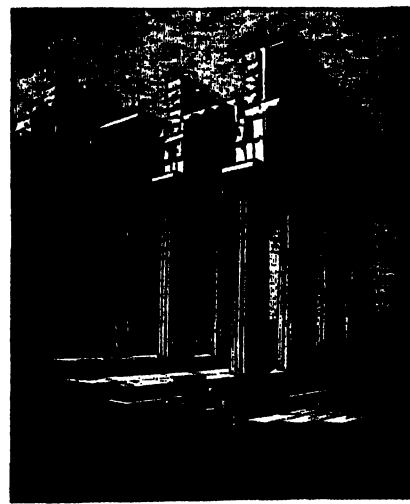

11. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Doris in Greece.—2. A member of the Doric or Dorian race, one of the four great divisions of the ancient Hellenes or Greeks (the others being the Æolians, the Ionians, and the Achaean). In the historical period the Dorians occupied southern and western Peloponnesus, the chief state of the race being Sparta, as well as Megara, Corinth, Argos, Caidas, Halicarnassus, Rhodes, Corcyra, Syracuse, Tarentum, etc.

Doric (dôr'ik), a. and n. [Formerly Dorick, Doricks; = F. Dorique = Sp. Dórico = Pg. Dórico, < L. Doricus, < Gr. dôpous, < dôpous, Doris; see Dorian.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to Doris or its inhabitants.—2. Pertaining to the Doric race; characteristic of or derived from the Dorians.

He touch'd the tender stops of various quills,
With eager thought warbling his Doric lay.

Milton, Lycidas, l. 128.

Doric cyma. See cyma, 1.—Doric dialect. See IL.—Doric mode. See mode.—Doric order, in arch., the oldest and strongest of the three Greek orders, in its external forms the simplest of all, but in its most perfect examples, especially as exhibited in the monuments of the age of Pericles at Athens, combining with solidity and force the most subtle and delicate refinement of outlines and proportions that architecture has known. In a de-based and distorted form, the Doric constituted the second order of the Romans, coming between their Tuscan and Ionic. A characteristic of the Grecian Doric column is the absence of a base; the channelings are usually 20 in number, and in section approximate to a semi-ellipse; the capital has generally no astragal, but only one or more fillets or annulets, which separate the channelings from the echinus. The profile of the capital in the best examples is a carefully studied eccentric curve, neither flat enough to be hard in effect, nor full enough to be weak. The echinus prior to the time of perfection spread out far beyond the shaft; the later Greeks made it a frustum of a cone, and the Romans cut it as an ordinary quarter-round. In good Greek examples, as a rule, no horizontal lines are found in a Doric building, floor- and cornice-lines, etc., being curved slightly upward; the profiles of the column-shafts are slightly convex, and all columns are slightly inclined toward the center of the building. All these particularities have relation to optical effects so subtle that their influence is felt rather than seen.

The first of the Roman orders is the Doric, which, like everything else in this style, takes a place about half-way between the Tuscan Roman posts and the nobly simple order of the Greeks. J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., l. 128.

II. a. The Doric dialect; the language of the Dorians, a dialect of the Greek or Hellenic, characterized by its broadness and hardness: hence applied to any dialect with similar characteristics, especially to the Scotch.

Doricism (dôr-i-sizm), n. [< Doric + -ism.] A peculiarity of the Doric dialect; a characteristic of Doric speech or manner.

Doricide (dôr-i-sis), v. t.; pret. and pp. Doriced, ppr. Doricising. [< Doric + -ide.] To render Doric in character. Also spelled Dorides.

The Ionic order, for instance, which arose in the Grecian colonies on the coast, is only the native style of this country Doriced, if the expression may be used.
J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 238.

Dorididae, Doridæ (dô-rid'i-dê, dô-ri-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Doris (Dorid-) + -idae.] A family of marine nudibranchiate gastropods, the sea-lemons, having no shell or mantle, and the gills disposed circularly in a rosette around the anus (pygobranchiate), which is on the dorsal aspect. See out under Doris.

doridoid (dôr-i-doid), a. [< Doris (Dorid-) + -oid.] Like a sea-lemon; being or resembling an animal of the genus Doris or family Dorididae: as, a doridoid nudibranchiate.

Doridopidae (dôr-i-dop'i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Doridopis + -idae.] A family of nudibranchiate gastropods, typified by the genus Doridopis. They are superficially like the Dorididae, but have a suctorial mouth without any odontophore.

Doridopsis (dôr-i-dop'is), n. [NL., < Gr. dôpîc (dôpîd-), a knife (see Doris), + ôps, view, appearance.] The typical genus of the family Doridopidae.

Dorippe (dô-rip'is), n. [NL., < Gr. dôpîc (see Doris) + ippos, a horse.] The typical genus of Mask-crab (Dorippe sima).

the family Dorippidae, containing such species as D. sima, the mask-crab. They are noted as crabs with which certain sea-anemones are cancerisocial.

Dorippidae (dô-rip'i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Dorippe + -idae.] A family of anomuran decapod crustaceans, typified by the genus Dorippe.

Doris (dô-ris), n. [NL., < Gr. dôpîc (also dôpîc, appar. after dôp, a spear), a knife used at sacrifices, prop. a Dorian knife (see Doris), a knife), being prop. adj., dôpîc, Dorian;

Sea-lemon (Doris johnstoni).

also, as a noun, the country of the Dorians: see Dorian.] The typical genus of the family Dorididae, or sea-lemons, containing such species as D. tuberculata, D. johnstoni, and D. coccinea. Argo is a synonym.

Dorism (dô-rism), n. [< Gr. dôpîsmos, speaking in Doric, < dôpîc, speak Doric: see Doris.] An idiom or peculiarity of the Doric dialect; a Doricism.

According to Brand, the latest writer on the subject, all those Dorisms which appear in the Boeotian dialect are either survivals of the Doric speech of the conquered inhabitants, or are importations from the neighboring communities to the west. Amer. Jour. Philol., VII. 457.

Dorise (dô-ris), v. t.; pret. and pp. Dorised, ppr. Dorising. [< Gr. dôpîc, imitate the Dorians, speak Doric, < dôpîc, Doris: see Dorian.] I. trans. To use the dialect or customs of the Dorians.

II. trans. To make Doric.

Boeotia was originally an Asolic land, and . . . it was partially Dorised at an early period of its history. Amer. Jour. Philol., VII. 451.

dorking (dôr'king), n. [So called from Dorking, in Surrey, England, where these fowls have been extensively bred.] A breed of domestic fowls, of good size, and of fair quality as egg-producers, but especially valuable for the table. The breed is characterized by the long, low, full shape, and by having five toes on each foot. There are white, silver-gray, colored, and cuckoo dorkings, having either single combs or rose-combs. The cuckoo dorkings are barred black and white. The general characteristics of the silver-gray and colored varieties are: hens, gray (in the colored variety, brownish or spotted black), with salmon breasts; cocks, glossy black on breast, with back, neck, saddle, wing-bow, and secondaries white.

Dormer-window of the Hôtel de Jacques Cartier, Bourges, France; 19th century.

dommone (It. 'sleep-mouse'), a dormouse. A rodent of the family Myomysidae. The dormouse is peculiar among rodents in having no canines.

The general appearance is squirrel-like, hence the name squirrel-mouse sometimes given to these animals; but the structure and general affinities are entirely different. The dormice are confined to the old world, and are widely distributed in Europe and Asia, with some outlying forms in Africa. Their shape is neat and graceful; they have full eyes, slender limbs, and a long hairy tail, which in Myomys proper is bushy and delicious throughout, in Muscardinus bushy but cylindrical, in Sitomys tufted and flattened at the end, and in Graphiurus shorter and like a lead-pencil. There are about 15 species of the 4 genera named. The common dormouse is Muscardinus avellanarius, only about as large as the house-mouse; the fat dormouse or lotr (Myomys lotr) and the garden-dormouse or levet (Sitomys sylvia) are both much larger. The dormice hibernate in a lethargic or torpid state, occasionally waking up in mild weather, and availing themselves of a stock of provisions which they have hoarded. He was made for other purpose than to be ever eating as swine, ever sleeping.

dorrie, a. An obsolete form of dory.
Dorrie (dôr'ri), a. [Dorr (see dorr), + -drie.] In U. S. Hist., one of those who engaged in or favored the revolutionary movement for a reformation of the then existing oligarchical State government of Rhode Island in 1841-42, led by Thomas W. Dorr. The effort ended in a slight insurrection called the "Dorr rebellion," after the irregular adoption by a majority of the people of a new constitution and the election of Dorr as governor; but its object was in great part effected by a constitution legally formed and adopted in the autumn of 1842.

dorsabdominal (dôr-sab-dom'i-nal), a. [L. dorsum, the back, + abdomen, abdomen: see abdominal.] Pertaining to the back and the belly; specifically said of the situation of parts, or direction of a line or plane, between the dorsal and abdominal or ventral aspects of the body: as, a dorsabdominal axis; a dorsabdominal direction. Also dorsocentral, dorsocentral.—Dorsabdominal symmetry, a kind of symmetry or reversed repetition on the opposite (dorsal and abdominal) sides of a plane passing through the middle of the body perpendicularly to both the median vertical or longitudinal and the transverse planes; one of the three kinds of symmetry which an organism may present, the other two being bilateral symmetry and anteroposterior symmetry. It is less evident than either of the other two, and usually inappreciable.

dorsabdominally (dôr-sab-dom'i-nal-i), adv. In a dorsabdominal direction or relative position; from back to belly, and conversely; dorsiventrally: as, a line drawn dorsabdominally.

dorsad (dôr'sad), adv. [L. dorsum, the back, + ad, toward.] In anat., toward the dorsum or back; backward, with reference to the animal itself, without regard to its posture: as, the spinal cord lies dorsad of the bodies of the vertebrae; the aorta arches dorsad as well as sinistrad; opposed to ventrad, and in Vertebrata equivalent to neurad.

dorsadiform (dôr'sad-i-fôr'm), a. [dorsad + -form.] In anat., having that form in which the tendency of extension of the body is upward above the shoulders, as the common perch and many other fishes. Gill.

dorsal (dôr'sal), a. and n. [F. dorsal = Sp. Pg. dorsal = It. dorsale, < ML. dorsalis (< L. dorsum), pertaining to the back, < L. dorsum, the back: see dorsal, dorsum.] I. a. 1. In anat.: (a) Of or pertaining to the back: as, the dorsal fin of a fish; dorsal muscles, nerves, etc. (b) Of or pertaining to the back of a part or organ: as, the dorsal aspect of the hand; the dorsal surface of the breast-bone; the dorsal artery of the penis.—2. In entom., pertaining to the upper surface of the thorax or abdomen.—Dorsal eyes, in zool., those eyes which are situated nearly in the middle of the upper surface, as in certain Arachnida.—Dorsal fin, in ichthyol., the fin or fin-like integumentary expansion generally developed on the back of aquatic vertebrates—that is, leptocephalians, myxins, selachians, true fishes, and osteichthys. Abbreviated d. or D. See cut under fin.—Dorsal lamina, in embryol., longitudinal folds of blastoderm forming a ridge on each side of the primitive groove of vertebrate embryos, and eventually uniting over it to convert it into the notochordal canal: opposed to ventral lamina, which similarly incloses the rest of the body.

A linear depression, the primitive groove, makes its appearance on the surface of the blastoderm, and the substance of the mesoblast along each side of this groove grows up, carrying with it the superjacent epiblast. Thus are produced the two dorsal laminae. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 12.

Dorsal muscles, in human anat., those muscles which lie upon the back. Those of the so-called first and second layers, however, pertain to the anterior extremity or fore limb.—Dorsal nerves, those spinal nerves which emerge in relation with dorsal vertebrae.

—Dorsal punctures, in entom., impressed dots, few in number and determinate in position, found on the elytra of certain beetles, principally the Cicadellidae. They are of great service in distinguishing species, and are not to be confounded with the ordinary irregular punctures of the surface.—Dorsal segments, in entom., the segments of the abdomen, seen from above, and numbered from the base to the apex.—Dorsal surface, in entom., the upper surface of the wing, including the elytra if these be present.—Dorsal surface, in bot., the outer surface or ridge of a carpel or pod, corresponding to the midvein of the dorsispinal (dôr-si-spi'nal), a. [L. dorsum, the back, + spina, spine, + -al.] In anat., of or pertaining to both the back and the spine. — Dorsispinal vein, in human anat., one of a set of veins which form a network about the processes and arches of vertebra.

dorsiventral (dôr-si-ven'tral), a. [L. dorsum, the back, + venter, the belly, + -al.] 1. In anat., same as dorsobdominal. — 2. In bot., same as bifacial. 2. Also dorsoventral.

dorsiventrality (dôr-si-ven'tral'i-ti), n. [dorsiventral + -ity.] The condition of being dorsiventral. [Rare.]

dorsiventrally (dôr-si-ven'tral'i), adv. In a dorsiventral direction or situation; from back to belly; dorsobdominally. Also dorsoventrally.

The giraffe running dorsoventrally. Science, III, 334.

dorsocaudal (dôr-sô-kä'dal), a. [L. dorsum, the back, + cauda, tail, + -al.] In anat., superior and posterior in direction or position.

dorsocervical (dôr-sô-sér-vi-kal), a. [L. dorsum, the back, + cervix (cervic-), the neck, + -al.] In anat., pertaining to or situated on the back of the neck; pertaining to both the back and the neck. — Dorsocervical vertebra, equivocal vertebra between the thoracic and the cervical series proper.

dorsodynia (dôr-sô-din'i-ä), n. [NL., < L. dorsum, the back, + dynia, pain.] In pathol., myalgia in the muscles of the back.

dorso-epitrochlear (dôr-sô-ep-i-trok-lë-fr), a. and n. 1. a. In anat., of or pertaining to the dorso-epitrochlearis or epitrochlearis muscle. II. a. Same as dorso-epitrochlearis.

dorso-epitrochlearis (dôr-sô-ep-i-trok-lë-fr), n.; pl. dorso-epitrochleares (-rës). [NL., < L. dorsum, the back, + tr., upon, + trochlea, q. v.] A muscle which in some quadrupeds passes from the back to the elbow.

dorsiflexion (dôr-sô-flek'shun), n. [L. dorsum, the back, + flexio (-n-), a bending: see flexion.] A bending of the back; a bow. Froude, Carlyle, I, 51.

dorso-intestinal (dôr-sô-in-tes'ti-nal), a. [L. dorsum, the back, + intestinalis, intestine, + -al.] In anat., situated on the dorsal aspect of the intestine. R. Owen.

dorsolateral (dôr-sô-lat'e-ral), a. [L. dorsum, the back, + latus (later-), side, + -al.] Pertaining to the back and the side; dorsal and lateral in position; situated on the side of the back; dorsopleural. Also dorsolateral. — Dorsolateral muscle or muscles, the large segmented mass of muscle in fishes lying between the lateral and dorsal septa, and the muscles in higher animals which are derived from this.

dorsolumbar (dôr-sô-lum'bär), a. [L. dorsum, the back, + lumbus, loin, + -ar.] In anat., pertaining to the whole dorsal (that is, the thoracic and lumbar) region of the trunk of the body: said especially of those vertebrae, collectively considered, which intervene between the cervical and the sacral vertebrae proper. The most obvious and usual distinction between dorsal and lumbar vertebrae being the presence of developed ribs on the former and their absence from the latter, and ribs being frequently developed from the cervical to the sacral region of the spine, the whole series of such rib-bearing vertebrae is called dorsolumbar. The epithet is also used in the phrase dorsolumbar region. Also dorsolumbar.

The variations within the dorsolumbar region depend on the ribs. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 437.

dorsomedian (dôr-sô-më'di-an), a. [L. dorsum, the back, + medius, middle, + -an.] Situated in the midline of the back. Huxley. [Rare.]

dorsomesal (dôr-sô-mes'al), a. Same as dorsomesal.

dorso-orbicularis (dôr-sô-ör-bik'ü-lä-ris), n.; pl. dorso-orbiculares (-rës). A muscle of the hedgehog, arising on the back near the termination of the trapezius, and spreading upon the orbicularis panniculi, which it antagonizes.

dorsopleural (dôr-sô-plö-ral), a. [L. dorsum, the back, + Gr. πλευρά, the side, + -al.] In anat., of or pertaining to the back and the side. dorsosaeus (dôr-sô-së-us), n.; pl. dorsosaei (-i). [NL. (Coues, 1887), < L. dorsum, the back, + osaeus, of bone: see osaeus.] A dorsal interosseus muscle of the hand or foot.

dorsoventral (dôr-sô-ven'tral), a. 1. Same as dorsobdominal.

In both forms the polyps show a well-marked bilateral symmetry with regard to the dorsoventral axis. Jour. Micros. Science, XXVIII, 88.

2. Same as bifacial.

dorsoventrally (dôr-sô-ven'tral'i), adv. Same as dorsiventrally.

Dorstenia (dôr-së-ni-ä), n. [NL., named after T. Dorsten (died 1552), a German botanist.] A genus of herbaceous plants, of the natural order Urticaceae, nearly related to the mulberry and fig, characterized by minute naked monoclonous flowers crowded upon a flat or somewhat concave fleshy receptacle.

The leaves are all radical, and the naked peduncle rises from a thickened rootstock. There are about 80 species, natives of tropical America and Africa, with a single species in the East Indies. The rhizome usually possesses tonic and stimulating properties. Contrayerva is the product of D. Contrayerva, D. Brasilensis, and some other species of Brazil.

dorsulum (dôr-sü-lum), n.; pl. dorsula (-lë). [NL., dim. of L. dorsum, the back.] In entom., a name given by Kirby to the mesoscutum or second dorsal sclerite of the thorax. It is conspicuous in hymenoptera.

dorsum (dôr-sum), n.; pl. dorsa (-së). [L., the back, a ridge: see dorsus, dorsal.] 1. In anat.: (a) The back. (b) The back of a part or organ: as, the dorsum of the foot; the dorsum of the shoulder-blade. — 2. In conch., the upper surface of the body of a shell, the aperture being downward. — 3. The ridge of a hill.

A similar ridge, which . . . suddenly rises into a meazy dorsum. T. Warren, Hist. Kiddington, p. 63.

Zetetesmus dorsalis [NL., the broadest muscle of the back in man. See cut under musculus. — Longissimus dorsalis [NL., the longest muscle of the back in man. See musculus.]

dorsumbonal (dôr-sum'bôn-al), a. [L. dorsum, the back, + umbo (-n-), a boss, + -al; see umbonal.] In soil, both dorsal and umbonal, as one of the accessory valves in the family Pholadidae.

In Pholad dactylus we find a pair of umbonal plates, a dorsumbonal plate and a dorsal plate. Bequa. Brit., XVI, 207.

dort (dört), n. [ME. dort (in comp. cauldor-dort, q. v.); origin obscure.] A sulky or sullen mood or humor; the sulks: usually in the plural: as, he is in the dorts. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Andrew, that left you in the dorts, is going to marry Nanny Kemp. Petticoat Tales, I, 284.

dort (dört), v. i. [Sc.: see dort, n.] To become pettish; sulky.

dortery (dört'er), n. [ME. dorter, dortour, dortours, dorture, < OF. dortor, dortour, dortour, dortoir, F. dortoir, < L. dormitorium, a sleeping-room, dormitory: see dormitory and dormer.] A sleeping-room; a dormitory, especially of a monastery.

At home in our dortour. Chaucer, Summoner's Tale, l. 147.

The Monks he chased here and there, And them pursu'd into their dortours sad. Spenser, F. Q., VI, xii, 24.

They thought there was no life after this; or if there were, it was without pleasure, and every soul thrust into a hole, and a dortor of a span's length allowed for his rest and for his walk. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1885), I, 328.

dorty (dört'ti), a. [Sc.: < dort + -y: see dort, n.] 1. Pettish; prone to sullenness; sulky.

Your well-seen love, and dorty Jenny's pride. Ramsay, Poems, II, 62.

2. Delicate; difficult to cultivate: applied to plants.

doruck (dör'ruk), n. A water-bottle used in modern Egypt.

dory (dö'ri), n.; pl. dories (-ris). [Also formerly doree, dorrie; < F. dorée, a dory, lit. 'gilt', fem. of doré, pp. of dorer, < LL. deaurare, gilt: see deaurate. Also called John-dory, where John is simply an expletive use of the familiar proper name, though it has been fancifully explained from F. jaune, yellow.] 1. A popular name of the acanthopterygious fish Zous feber, the type of the family Zoidae. It is found in the seas of Europe, and is esteemed very delicate eating. It seldom exceeds 18 inches in length. It is also called John-dory.

Dory (Zous feber).

2. A local name in some parts of the United States and Canada, especially along Lake Michigan, of Stisostedion citreum, the wall-eyed pike-perch.

dory (dö'ri), n.; pl. dories (-ris). [Origin uncertain.] A small boat; especially, a small flat-bottomed boat used in sea-fishing, in which to go out from a larger vessel to catch fish.

Doryfera (dö-rif'ä-së), n. Same as Doryphora. 2. Dorylasmus (dö-r-i-lä's-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. dōra, a spear, + λασμός, throat.] A genus of marine nematode worms, of the family Desphidae. D. marinus is a very common European species, found in the mud.

Dorylidae (dō-ril'-id), n. pl. [NL. < Dorylus + -idae.] A family of ants, differing from the Formicidae in having only the first abdominal segment forming the peduncle.

Dorylus (dōr'-i-lus), n. [NL.] The typical genus of the family Dorylidae.

Doryphora (dō-rif'-ō-rus), n. [NL. < Gr. dōryphōr, bearing a spear or shaft, < dōry, a stem, tree, shaft, spear, + -phōr, < phōr = E. bear.] 1. In entom.: (a) A genus of beetles, of the family Chrysomelidae, closely allied to Chrysomela, but differing from it in the form of the last joint of the maxillary palpi, which is short, truncate, and not dilated. Many species from South and Central America are known. The few which are found in North America live upon solanaceous plants. The most familiar of these is the Colorado potato-beetle, D. decemlineata (Say), commonly known as the potato-bug. (See under beetle.) Another very closely allied species, D. funebris (Germar), occurs in the eastern United States. This differs from the former in the arrangement of the black stripes on the elytra, the two outer ones being united behind, and in the color of the legs, which are entirely pale excepting a black femoral spot. The larvae of the two species are distinguished by the black color of the head of D. decemlineata, that of D. funebris being pale.

(b) A genus of Lepidoptera.—2. A genus of Polygastrica. Also Doryfera.

doryphorus (dō-rif'-ō-rus), n.; pl. doryphori (-ri). [< Gr. dōryphōr, bearing a spear; see Doryphora.] In Gr. antiqu., and in art and archaeol., a spear-bearer; a man armed with a spear; specifically, a nude figure, or one almost nude, holding a spear or lance: a favorite subject with ancient sculptors. The most noted statue known as a doryphorus was that by the great artist Polykleitos, which is regarded as his celebrated canon, or type of what the perfectly proportioned human figure should be.

His (Kresilas') statue of a Doryphoros is suggestive of influence from Polykleitos.

A. S. Murray, Greek Sculpture, II. 341.

Doryrhamphus (dōr'-i-ram'-f-us), n. pl. [NL. < Doryrhamphus + -us.] A subfamily of Synbranchiidae, in which "the males have the egg-pouch not on the tail, but on the breast and belly" (Kaup).

Doryrhamphus (dōr'-i-ram'-f-us), n. [NL. < Gr. dōry, a spear, + phōr, beak, bill.] A genus of synbranchoid fishes, typical of the subfamily Doryrhamphinae. Kaup, 1853.

dos & dos (dō' sū dō'), [F.: dos, < L. dorsum, the back; & to; dos, the back. Cf. vis-à-vis.] Back to back; specifically, in dancing, an evolution in reels, etc., in which two persons advance, pass around each other back to back, and return to their places.

dosage (dō'sāj), n. [< dos + -age.] 1. In med., the act or practice of administering medicine in doses; a course or method of dosing.

I pause in the dosage, and wait to see whether the symptoms improve.

N. Y. Med. Jour., XL. 3.

Infinitesimal dosages, increased potency by means of dynamization, the unification of disease, etc., have ceased to be essential plans in the homeopathic platform.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 333.

2. The operation of adding to wine, especially to sparkling wine, such as champagne, whatever is needful to give it an artificial distinctive character, as that of being dry or sweet, light or strong.

The dosage varies with the quality of the wine [champagne] and the country for which it is intended; but the genuine liquor [for the dosage] consists of nothing but old wine of the best quality, to which a certain amount of sugar-candy and perhaps a dash of the finest cognac has been added.

De Colange, I. 123.

dose (dōs), n. [= F. dose = Sp. dosis = Pg. dose, dose = It. dose, dose = D. G. Dan. Sw. dose, < NL. dosis, < Gr. dōsis, a giving, a portion prescribed, a dose of medicine, < dō-dō-sus, give: see dosis.] 1. The quantity of medicine given or prescribed to be taken at one time or within a specified time; of liquid medicine, a potion.

I am for curing the world by gentle alteratives, not by violent doses.

Irring.

Many circumstances influence the dose of medicine. Women require smaller doses, as a general principle, than men.

Duncheon.

Hence—2. Anything given to be swallowed, literally or figuratively; especially, a portion or allotment of something nauseous or disagreeable either to the recipient or to others.

As fulsome a dose as you shall give him, he shall readily take it down.

South.

3. A quantity or amount of something regarded as analogous in some respect to a medical prescription, or to medicine in use or effect.

They [Romanists] have retirement for the melancholy, business for the active, idleness for the lazy, honour for the ambitious, splendour for the vain, severity for the severe and hardy, and a good dose of pleasures for the soft and voluptuous.

Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. 1.

No paper . . . comes out without a dose of paragraphs against America.

Jefferson, Correspondence, I. 343.

James Mill constantly uses the expression dose of capital. "The time comes," he says, "at which it is necessary either to have recourse to land of the second quality, or to apply a second dose of capital less productively upon land of the first quality."

James, Polit. Econ., p. 231.

4. In wine-manuf., the quantity of something added to the wine to give it its peculiar character: as, a dose of syrup or cognac added to champagne. See dosage, 2.

In some [champagne] establishments the dose is administered with a tin can or ladle; but more generally an ingenious machine of pure silver and glass, which regulates the percentage of liquor to a nicety, is employed.

De Colange, I. 123.

Black dose. Same as black-draught.

dose (dōs), v. t.; pret. and pp. dosed, ppr. dosing. [= F. doser; from the noun.] 1. To administer in doses: as, to dose out a bottle of jalap.—2. To give doses to; give medicine or physic to.

A bold, self-opinioned physician, . . . who shall dose, and bleed, and kill him secundum artem!

South, Sermons, I. 236.

3. In wine-manuf., to add sugar, cognac, or whatever is needful to give a distinctive character to.—To dose with, to supply with a dose or quantity of; administer or impart to in or as if in doses: generally in a derogatory sense: as, to dose one with quack medicine, or with flattery; I dosed him with his own physic (that is, turned the tables upon him, paid him in his own coin).

Invited his dear brother to a feast, hugged and embraced, courted and caressed him till he had well dosed his weak head with wine, and his foolish heart with confidence and credulity.

South, Works, I. xi.

dosh (dō'se), n. [Ar. dose, dawse, a treading.] A religious spectacle or ceremony performed in Cairo during the festival of the Moollid, in which the dervishes pave the road with their bodies, while the sheik rides over them on horseback. See Moollid.

The present sheikh of the Saadee'ah refused, for several years, to perform the Dosh.

E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, II. 201.

dosim, n. A Middle English form of dosen.

dosel, n. An obsolete form of dossel.

doser, n. 1. An obsolete form of dossier, 1.—

2. Same as dossel, 2.

doshalla (dō-shal'), n. [Hind. doshāla, < dō, < Skt. dō = E. two, + shāl, shawl.] The Indian shawl, somewhat more than twice as long as it is wide, and anciently often as much as 8 feet long.

dosimeter (dō-sim'-e-tēr), n. [< NL. dosis, a dose, + L. metrum, a measure.] An apparatus for measuring minute quantities of liquid; a drop-meter.

Dosinia (dō-sin'-i-ā), n. [NL. (Scopoli, 1777), < dosis, a Senegalese (west African) name of a species, + -ia.] A notable genus of bivalve mollusks, of the family Veneridae. They have a large foot, united siphons, and a very flat round shell, as D. dione, a common species on the Atlantic coast of the United States.

dosiology (dō-si-ol'-ō-jī), n. [< Gr. dōsis, (dose, dose), a dose, + -logia, < lógos, speak.] Same as dosology.

Dosithean (dō-sith'-ē-an), n. One of a Samaritan sect, named from Dositheus, a false Messiah, who appeared about the time of Christ. Its members were fanatical in various respects, especially in a rigorous observance of the sabbath. The sect, though small in numbers, existed for several centuries.

Right valve of Dosinia aculeata.

dosology (dō-sol'-ō-jī), n. [< Gr. dōsis, a dose, + -logia, < lógos, speak: see dose and -ology.]

1. What is known about the doses or quantities and combinations in which medicines should be given; the science of apportioning or dividing medicines into doses.—2. A treatise on dosing.

Also dosiology.

dosotee, n. See doosotee.

B. Jonson.

You should have had a sumpter, though 't had cost me The laying on myself: where now you are fain To hire a ripper's mare, and buy new dossers.

Fletcher (and another), Noble Gentleman, v. 1.

4. In her., same as water-budget.

dossier (dō'sēr), n. [Appar. < doss, a hassock (also, a mattress), + -er.] One who lodges at a doss-house.

A dossier is the frequenter of the lodging-houses of the poor.

Spectator, No. 3059, p. 237.

doss-house (dōs'-hous), n. In London, a very cheap lodging-house, furnished with straw beds.

Between the fourpenny doss-house and the expensive Peabody or Waterlow building, adequate lodging of a wholesome and really cheap kind is so rarely to be found as to be practically non-existent in more crowded quarters of London.

Fortnightly Rev., N. B., XLIII. 261.

dossière (dōs-i-ēr), n. [OF. dossiere, dossiere, a certain: see dossier.] In armor, a piece protecting the back; the piece which covered the back from below the neck to the waist. In the early years of the fourteenth century the dossière was divided in the middle, and the two parts were connected by means of hinges. When worn with the brigandine of splints, the dossière covered the lower part of the back only, corresponding with the pansiers in front.

dossil, dossel (dōs'-il, -el), n. [< ME. dossil, dossile, dossile, dussel, < OF. dossil, dossil, dossil = Pr. dossil, < ML. dossilus, dussilus, dussilus, a spigot, a dim. form, lit. a little conduit, < L. ducere, lead, conduct: see duct.] 1. A spigot in a cask; a plug.

Hel casto away the dossle, that win orn [ran] abroad.

Robert of Gloucester, p. 642.

2. A wisp of hay or straw to stop up an aperture. [Prov. Eng.]—3. The rose at the end of a water-pipe. [Prov. Eng.]—4. In surg., a pledget or small portion of lint made into a cylindrical or conical form, for purging a wound.—5. A roll of cloth for cleaning the ink from an engraved plate previous to printing. [In the last two senses usually dossil.]

dost (dōst), n. The second person singular indicative present of do.

dot (dōt), n. [< ME. **dot* (not found), < AS. dot, a dot, speck (found only once, applied to the speck at the head of a boil); prob. = Ddot, "a little bundle of spoiled wool, thread silk or such like, which is good for nothing" (Sewel), = East Fries. dotte, dot, a clump, Fries. dodd, a clump, = Sw. dial. dot, a little heap, clump. Hence dot; also (< AS. dot) AS. dytten, E. dit, stop up, plug.] A point or minute spot on a surface; a small spot of different color, opacity, or material from that of the surface on which it is situated.

Long stood Sir Bedivere
Revolving many memories, till the hull Look'd one black dot against the verge of dawn.
Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

Specifically—(a) A small spot introduced in the variegation of cloth: as, polka dots in women's dress-fabrics. (b) In writing and printing, a minute round spot serving—(1) as a customary distinction, as the dot over the body of i and j and formerly of y, or (2) as a special diacritic, as the dots of h, k, g, etc., in the notation of pronunciation used in this dictionary, or the vowel-signs or points in Hebrew and Arabic, or (3) as a mark of punctuation, as the period, which consists of one dot, and the colon, which consists of two dots.

The dot on the letter i came into fashion in the 14th century.
Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 161.

(c) In musical notation (1) A point placed after a note or rest, to indicate that the duration of the note or rest is to be increased one half. A double dot further increases the duration by one half the value of the single dot:

(2) A point placed over or under a note, to indicate that the note is to be performed somewhat staccato (which see); but in old music, when several dots are placed over a long note, they indicate that it is to be subdivided into as many short notes:

(3) When placed in the spaces of a staff with a heavy or double bar, dots indicate the beginning or end of a repeat (which see). (d) In embroidery, and in weaving imitating embroidery, a simple, small, round spot, especially when solid or opaque, on a thin and translucent ground. There are several kinds, distinguished chiefly by their size, as point de pois, point dor, etc. (e) In plastering: (1) pl. Nails so driven into a wall that their heads are left projecting a certain distance, thus forming a stage to show how thick the plaster should be laid on. (2) A patch of plaster put on to regulate the setting rate in making screeds and bays.

dot<sup>1</sup> (dôt), v.; pret. and pp. dotted, ppr. dotting. [dot<sup>2</sup>, n.] 1. trans. 1. To mark with dots; make a dot or dots in or upon: as, to dot an i; to dot a surface.

Some few places, which are here, and in other parts of the chart, distinguished by a dotted line.
Cook, Voyages, II. ii. 7.

2. To mark or diversify with small detached objects: as, a landscape dotted with cottages or clumps of trees.

Dotting the fields of corn and vine,
Like ghosts, the huge gnar'd olives shine.
M. Arnold.

3. To place so as to appear like dots.

All about were dotted leafy trees.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 222.

Dotted line, a line of dots on a surface made for some specific purpose, as in a map, diagram, or drawing to mark an indefinite boundary, route, or outline, in printing to mark an omission or to guide the eye from one point to another, etc.—Dotted manner (F. maniere criblée), a system of engraving in dots, peculiar to the fifteenth century. When on metal plates the larger dots were probably punched out of the metal and the smaller indented, but not to complete perforation. The work was either in relief or in intaglio, according to circumstances. When on wood the circular spots were cut out so as to reduce the surface of the blocks. Dotted metal plates were intended to serve as ornaments for book-covers and -corners, or for pieces of furniture, and their indented dots were filled with enamel. Before the enamel was put in the goldsmith was accustomed to rub off impressions upon paper with a burnisher; and these impressions are known as prints in the dotted manner.—Dotted note or rest, in musical notation, a note or rest with a dot after it. See dot<sup>1</sup>, n. (1).—Dotted stitch. Same as dot-stitch.

II. *intrans. To make dots or spots.—To dot and carry, or carry one, etc., in performing addition, as in school, to set down the units of an added column and carry the tens to the next column. [In the extract used as a complex noun for the action.]

The metre, too, was regular As schoolboy's dot and carry.
Lowell, Origin of Didactic Poetry.

To dot and go one, to waddle. Grec. [Prov. Eng.] dot<sup>2</sup> (dôt), n. [F. dot = Fr. dot = Sp. Pg. dote = It. dote, dote, < L. dote (dot), dower: see dote<sup>3</sup> (the prop. E. form, though now obsolete) and dower<sup>2</sup>.] In mod. civil law, dowry; property which the wife brings upon her marriage to the husband, the income of which is in his control for the expenses of the marital establishment, the principal remaining her separate property.

It is either formally settled by a written instrument, or secured by expressing the marriage contract as under the dotal rule.

The dos or dotal estate is something very different from our "dower." It has become the dot of French law, and is the favourite form of settling the property of married women all over the Continent of Europe. It is a contribution by the wife's family, or by the wife herself, intended to assist the husband in bearing the expenses of the conjugal household. Only the revenue belonged to the husband and many minute rules . . . prevented him from spending it on objects foreign to the purpose of the settlement. The corpus or capital of the settled property was, among the Romans (as now in France), incapable of alienation, unless with the permission of a court of justice.
Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 212.

doteage (dôt'aj), n. [ME. doteage; < dote<sup>1</sup> + -age.] 1. The state of one who dotes; feebleness or imbecility of mind in old age; second childhood; senility.

This tree is olde anon, and in his age
He gooth oute of his kynde into doteage.
Palsgrave, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 91.

From Marlborough's eyes the streams of doteage flow,
And Swift expires, a driveller and a show.
Johnson, Vanity of Human Wishes, l. 317.

2. Weak and foolish affection; excessive fondness.

Maist were our mynydes & our mad hedis,
And we in doteage full depe drowyn, by faith,
For the wille of a woman, & no wise ellis.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 9749.

Nay, but this doteage of our general's O'erflows the measure. Shak., A. and C., l. 1.

3. The folly imagined by one who is foolish and doting. [Rare.]

These are the foolish and childish doteages of such ignorant Barbarians.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 254.

Of living stately, richly, lends a cunning
To eloquence. Ford, Fancies, l. 2.

[People] must, as they thought, heighten and improve it [religion] till they had mixed with it the freaks of Enthusiasm, or the doteages of Superstition.

Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. viii.

dotal (dôt'al), a. [F. Pr. Sp. Pg. dotal = It. dotal, < L. dotalis, < dos (dot-), dower: see dot<sup>2</sup>.] Pertaining to dower, or a woman's marriage portion; constituting dower, or comprised in it.

Shall I, of one poor dotal town poment,
My people think my wretched country waste?
Garth, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., xiv.

Can you . . . think to front his revenges . . . with the palmed intercession of such a decayed dotalant as you seem to be?
Shak., Cor., v. 2.

dotalard (dôt'ard), n. and a. [Also dial. (in 2d sense) dottard; < ME. dotalard; < dote<sup>1</sup> + -ard.] 1. n. 1. One who is in his dotalage or second childhood; one whose intellect is impaired by age.

And though this slaterynge freres wyln for her pride
Disputen of this dayte as dotalerdes schulden,
The more the maters is moved the [masseders hy] worthen.
Piers Plowman's Crede (E. E. T. S.), l. 826.

The nonsense of Herodotus is that of a baby. The nonsense of Xenophon is that of a dotalard.

Macaulay, History.

2. One who is foolishly fond; one who dotes.

—3. An aged, decaying tree. [Prov. Eng.]

And for great trees, we see almost all overgrown trees, in church-yards, or near ancient buildings and the like, are pollards, or dotalards, and not trees at their full height.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 593.

II. a. 1. Doting; imbecile.

The shaft of scorn that once had stung
But wakes a dotalard smile.
Tennyson, Ancient Sage.

2. Decayed, as a tree. [Prov. Eng.]

Many dotalerdes and decaye trees are within divers manners surveye, which are conynquallie wrongfullie taken by the tenants.
Landowners MS. (1615), 165.

dotalrily (dôt'ar-ly), a. [dotalard + -ly.] Like a dotalard; weak.

dotalrily (dôt'ar-di), n. [dotalard + -y<sup>2</sup>.] The state of being a dotalard.

dotation (dôt-tā-shon), n. [= F. Pr. dotation = Sp. dotation = Fr. dotatio = It. dotazione, < ML. dotatio (n.), < L. dotare, endow, < dos (dot-), dower: see dot<sup>2</sup>.] 1. The act of endowing a woman with a marriage portion.—2. Endowment; establishment of funds for the support of some institution.

His dotation and glorious exaltation of the see of Rome.
Dr. Ridley, in Bradford's Letters (Parker Soc., 1858), [II. 160].

Sometimes these dotationes were made by common assent of the people, without any corporation.
R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., II.

dotehin (dôt'hin), n. [A corruption, through the Cantonese, of Chinese tek, take up in the hand, + ching, weigh.] The name given in the south of China to the portable steelyard in use throughout China and the adjoining countries. In the smaller kind, used for weighing silver dove (dōv), n. [= Sc. dōo, dōw, < ME. dōve, dōve, dōve, dōve, < AS. dōfo = OS. dōbba = D. dūf = LG. dūve = OHG. tūba, MHG. tūbe, G. tūbe = Icel. dōfa = Sw. dōfva = Dan. dō = Goth. dōbō, a dove, It. a diver, < AS. dōftan, etc., E. dive, dip. The application of the name to the bird is not clear (perhaps "from its habit of ducking the head, or from its manner of flight"). The AS. form dōfo is not recorded (but cf. dōfo-doppa, translating L. pellicanus: see under dōdapper, dōdapper), the name culfre, E. culver, q. v., being used; this is prob. ult. < L. columba, a dove, which also orig. means a 'diver': see columba.] 1. Any bird of the family Columbidae; a pigeon. The word has no more Capibara Dove (Zenaidura macroura).

specific meaning than this, being exactly synonymous with pigeon; in popular usage it is applied most frequently to a few kinds of pigeons best known to the public, and as a book-name is commonly attached to the smaller species of pigeons: as, the ring-dove, turtle-dove, stock-dove, ground-dove, quail-dove, etc. The Carolina dove, or mourning dove, is Zenaidura macroura. The common doves of the old world are the ring-dove, rock-dove, stock-dove, and turtle-dove. (See these words.) In poetry, and in literature generally, the dove is an emblem of innocence, gentleness, and tender affection. In sacred literature and art it is a symbol of the Holy Ghost.

The Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him. Luke III. 22.

Off I heard the tender dove
In firry woodlands making moan.

Tennyson, Miller's Daughter.

3. Eccles., a repository or tabernacle for the eucharist in the form of a dove, formerly used in the East and in France.

There generally were two vessels: the smaller one, or the piz, that held the particles of the blessed Eucharist; the larger cup, or dove, within which the other was shut up. Book of the Church of our Fathers, III. II. 303.

dove's-foot (dov's'fēt), n. 1. The popular name in England of Geranium molle, a common British plant: so called from the shape of its leaf.—2. The columbine.

doveship (dov'ship), n. [< dove<sup>1</sup> + -ship.] The character of a dove; the possession of dove-like qualities, as meekness, gentleness, innocence, etc.

For us, let our dove-ship approve itself in meekness of suffering, not in actions of cruelty.

Dr. Hall, The Beauties and Virtues of the Church.

dovetail (dov'tail), n. [< dove + tail. Cf. equiv. interlock.] In carp., a tenon cut in the form of a dove's tail spread, or of a reversed wedge; a manner of fastening boards or timbers together by letting tenons so cut on one into corresponding cavities or mortises in another. This is the strongest of all fastenings, as the dovetails cannot be drawn out except by force applied in the direction of their length. Dovetails are either exposed or concealed; concealed dovetailing is of two kinds, lapped and mitred. See also cut under joint.—Dovetail-cut dovetail, a dovetail having each part dovetailed to fit into the space between the teeth of the corresponding portions.—Dovetail-file, dovetail-knife. See file, knife.—Dovetail-joint, in anat., the suture or serrated articulation, as of the bones of the head.—Dovetail-molding, an ornament in the form of a dove's tail, occurring in Romanesque architecture.—Dovetail-plates, in ship-building, plates of metal let into the heel of the stern-post and keel of a vessel to bind them together. Similar plates are used for joining the stern-post with the fore end of the keel. See cut under stern.—Dovetail-saw. See saw.—Secret dovetail, a manner of joining in which neither pins nor dovetails extend through the work, being concealed by its outer face.

dovetail (dov'tail), v. t. [< dovetail, n.] 1. To unite by tenons in the form of a pigeon's tail spread let into corresponding mortises in a board or timber: as, to dovetail the angles of a box.—2. Figuratively, to unite closely, as if by dovetails; fit or adjust exactly and firmly; adapt, as one institution to another, so that they work together smoothly and harmoniously.

Into the hard conglomerate of the hill the town is built; house walls and precipices morticed into one another, dove-tailed by the art of years gone by, and riveted by age.

J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 10.

He [Lord Chatham] made an administration so checkered and speckled, he put together a piece of joinery so crossly indented and whimsically dove-tailed, etc.

Burke, American Taxation.

When any particular arrangement has been for a course of ages adopted, everything also has been adapted to it, and, as it were, fitted and dovetailed into it. Brougham.

dovetailed (dov'tild), a. In her., broken into dovetails, as the edge or bounding line of an ordinary or any division of the field. See antis.

dow<sup>1</sup> (dou), v. t.; pret. dowed, dought. [< ME. dowen, doghen, dagen, dagen, pres. ind. doth, doth, dogh, later dove, doghe, pret. dought, doughts, doughts, doht, < A.S. dagun (pres. ind. doth, pl. dagun, pret. dohte) = O.S. dagun = O.Fris. dagun = D. daguen = M.L.G. dagun, L.G. dāgen = O.H.G. dagun, M.H.G. dagun, dagun, G. dagun = Icel. daga = O.Sw. dagha, dogha, Sw. daga = Dan. dag = Goth. dagun (only in pres. dag), be good, fitting, able: a preterit-present verb, the pres., A.S. doth, Goth. dag, being orig. a pret. from a root **dag*, be good, perhaps akin to Gr. rixa, fortune, luck, ryx-dow, doxia. Hence dought, doughty. The word dow, becoming combined in sense and form, and dialectally in pronunciation, in certain constructions with the different verb do, was at length in literary use completely merged with it; but dow remains in dialectal use: see do<sup>1</sup> and do<sup>2</sup>. The difference well appears in the A.S. line "dō ðæt he ðe daga" ('do aye that dows,' i. e., do always that which is proper). The two verbs also appear (do<sup>1</sup> twice, in the sense of 'put' in the first quot. below.) 1. To be good, as for a purpose; be proper or fitting; suit.

[do + ME. dower, dowers, doweyre, < AF. dowers, OF. dowere, F. dowaire = Fr. dotaire, < ML. **dotarium* (also dotarium, after OF.), < L. dos (dot-), < dower: see dot, dotation, dow, endow.] 1. The property which a woman brings to her husband at marriage; dowry.

Is there a virgin of good fame wants dower?

He is a father to her. Fletcher, Beggars Bush, I. 2.

He wedded a wife of richest dower,

Who lived for fashion, as he for power.

Whittier, Maud Muller.

2. In law, the portion which the law allows to a widow for her life out of the real property in which her deceased husband held an estate of inheritance. At common law it is one third of such real property held by the husband at any time during the marriage as the common issue of the husband and wife might have inherited, except such property as has been conveyed with the concurrence of the wife. The wife may also have the right of dower by accepting a jointure. By modifying statutes, in some of the United States, the dower is sometimes a share in fee, and sometimes extends only to property which the husband held at the time of his death. In England, by the Dower Act of 1833, the common-law rights of the wife have been greatly modified, her dower being entirely under the control of the husband. In the earlier periods of the common law several kinds of dower were used, as dower ad usum vite, which was dower voluntarily pledged by the husband at the porch of the church where the marriage was solemnized; and in this case the share might be less than a third, or (except for a restriction at one time imposed for the protection of the interests of feudal lords) it might be more than a third. This was, sometimes at least, done by the declaration in the marriage service "with all my lands I thus endow," or the husband might specify a particular manor or other lands. If he had no lands, or chose to mention goods only, the declaration was, as now, "with all my worldly goods I thus endow," in which case the wife, if she survived him, was entitled to a third of the personal property left by him; and if he left lands, the law, notwithstanding his assertion to provide dower in them, gave her what was called reasonable dower, or dower according to custom, viz., the life estate in one third as above described, unless she had accepted a jointure or other provision in lieu of dower.

The dower of lands in English law . . . belonged to a class of institutions widely spread over western Europe, very similar in general character, often designated as dower, but differing considerably in detail.

Meine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 282.

3. One's portion of natural gifts; personal endowment.

He's noble every way, and worth a wife

With all the dower of virtue.

Beau. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, v. 2.

And if, as toward the silent tomb we go,
Through love, through hope, and faith's transcendent

dower,

We feel that we are greater than we know.

Wordsworth, River Duddon, xxiv.

Admeasurement of dower, a proceeding to set off to a widow the third of her deceased husband's property to which she is legally entitled.—Assignment of dower. See assign, v.—Incumbent right of dower, that antedation of a right of dower which a wife of the owner of real property has during his life, it being contingent on her surviving as his widow.—Release of dower, the act or instrument by which an incumbent right of dower is extinguished. At common law this is effected only by joining in the husband's deed of conveyance.—To assign dower. See assign.—To bar dower, to preclude the claiming of dower by a widow, as by her joining her husband in conveying during his life.—Writ of dower, a process for the establishing of the right of dower, or the recovery of the land by the widow.

dower (dou'er), v. t. [do + dower, n.] To furnish with dower; portion; endow.

Will you,

Dower'd with our curse, and stranger'd with our oath,

Take her, or leave her? Shak., Lear, I. 1.

The poet in a golden clime was born,

With golden stars above;

Dower'd with the hate of hate, the scorn of scorn,

The love of love.

Twain, The Poet.

dower-house (dou'er-hous), n. In Great Britain, a house provided for the residence of a widow after the estate of her husband, with its manor-house, has passed to the heir.

dowerless (dou'er-less), a. [do + dower + -less.] Destitute of dower; having no portion or fortune.

Dowerless to court some peasant's arms,

To guard your withered age from harm.

E. More, The Colt and the Farmer, Fable 12.

dowry (dou'er-i), n. An obsolete form of dowry.

dowl (douf), a. [do, also written douf, douf, etc., < Iscl. daufr, dauf, dull, = E. dauf, q. v. Cf. dow.] 1. Dull; flat; noting a defect of spirit or animation, and also of courage; melancholy; gloomy; inactive; lethargic; pithless; vapid; wanting force; frivolous. Jamieson.

They're [Italian lay] dowl and dowl at the best,

Dowl and dowl, dowl and dowl,

They're dowl and dowl at the best,

Wi' a' their variorum. J. Skinner, Tullochgorum.

2. Dull; hollow: as, a dowl sound. Jamieson.

dowrie (dou'i), a. Dull; melancholy; in bad health; in bad tune. [Scotch.]

She mairna put on the black, the black,

Nor yet the dowie brown.

Sweet Willie and Fair Anne (Child's Ballads, II. 126).

O bonny, bonny, sang the bird,

Sat on the coil o' hay,

But dowie, dowie, was the maid

That follow'd the corpse clay.

Clark Saunders, II. 224.

dowitch (dou'ich), n. Same as dowitcher. [Local, U. S. (New York).]

dowitcher (dou'ich-er), n. [A corruption of G. doutich, German (or D. doutich, Dutch), doutcher, a German: see Dutch.] The red-breasted or gray-backed snipe, Macrorhamphus griseus: a popular and now a book name of this species, which was formerly locally (Long Island and vicinity) called German or Dutch snipe, to distinguish it from the so-called English snipe, Gallinago Wilsoni. A closely related species, M. scolopacea, is known as the long-billed, western, or white-tailed dowitcher. The name is sometimes locally misapplied to the peacock sandpiper, Actropus macularia. Also dowitch, dowitcher, barstard dowitcher or dowitch, the salt-sandpiper, Microperla bimaculatus.

dowl, dowls (douk), n. [E. dial., prob. = Sc. dalk, varieties of slate clay, sometimes common clay, = dowk, "a soft and black substance chiefly of clay, mica, and what resembles coal-dust," = dough = E. dough, q. v.] The name given in the mining districts of the north of England to the dark-colored argillaceous material which not unfrequently constitutes a considerable part of the veins.

The news of honey dew and excellent rider have frequently proved the only signs of unsuccessful adventures.

Reverend, Mining District of Alston Moor, p. 108.

dowl (douk), n. [Also written dowls, dowl, prob. < OF. douille, douls, doile, soft, something soft (> F. douille, soft, downy, douillotte, a wadded garment), F. dial. douille, hairs, < L. duellus, ductile: see duellus.] One of the filaments which make up the blade of a feather; a fiber of down; down.

Hist. of Man. Arts (1821).

No feather or dowl of a feather but was heavy enough for him.

De Quincey.

dowls, dowlans (dou'las), n. [Prob., like many other names of cloths, from a town name; said to be from Doullens, a town in the department of Somme, France.] A strong and coarse linen cloth, used, until the introduction of machine-woven cotton cloth, for purposes not requiring fine linen. Yorkshire and the south of Scotland were the chief places of its manufacture during the eighteenth century.

The maid, subdued by tears, her trunk unlocks,

And gives the cleanly aid of dowlans-smocks.

Gay, To the Earl of Burlington.

dowled, a. [ME., < dowls, dowls, dole, etc.: see dole.] Dead; flat. Hallivell.

And loke ye gyne no persons noo dowed dryake, for it wyl breke y<sup>e</sup> scabbie.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 224.

dowless (dou'les), a. [So., also doleless, < dowl, = dol, + -less.] Feeble; wanting spirit or activity; shiftless.

Dowless towk, for health gane down,

Along your howms be strecken

Their limbs this day. Pitson, Poems, p. 55.

dowly, adv. [ME., < dowls, dowls, dole, etc.: see dole.] Feebly; despairingly.

With fainting & febleness he fell to the ground

All dowlly, for dols, in a dede swoon.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 1287.

down (down), n. [Early mod. E. also downe, downe; < ME. down, down, earlier down, don, a hill, < AS. don, a hill, = OHG. don, a promontory, = Sw. dial. don, a hill; in the other Teut. languages confined to a special sense: = OFries. dōne, NFries. dōne = MD. downe, D. don = MLG. dunc, LG. dūne (> G. Sp. = E. dune, dial. dōne = F. dune = L. Sp. Pg. duna), a sand-hill, a sand-bank, a shifting ridge of sand (see dune); prob. of Celtic origin, < Ir. don, a hill, mount, fort, = W. don, a hill-fort (OCelt. **don*, in Latinized place-names, as Lugdunum, Lyons, Augustodunum, etc.), = OHG. MHG. don, G. don = OS. don = AS. don = Iscl. don, an inclosed place, an inclosure, a town (see town, which in these cognate with down); perhaps = Gr. δῶν (δῶν), a heap, a heap of sand, the beach or sea-shore, = Skt. dhanus, a sand-bank, dhanaw, beach, shore. Hence down, adv., prep., and v.] 1. A hill; a hill of moderate elevation and more or less rounded outline: in this general sense now chiefly in poetry, as opposed to dale, vale, valley.

The dubbenment [adornment] dore of down & dale,

Of wod & water & wolk [beautiful] playnes,

Byde in me blys, abated my balen.

Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), I. 121.

Downs, that almost escape th' inquiring eye,

That melt and fade into the distant sky.

Cowper, Retirement.

A traveller who has gained the brow

Of some aerial down.

Wordsworth, Prelude, ix.

A long street climbs to one tall-tower'd mill,

And high in heaven behind it a gray down.

Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

[This word enters (as Don, Don, down, down) into the names of numerous places formerly inhabited by the Celts in England, referring originally to a fortified hill, or a hill advantageously situated for defense.]

2. Same as dune. Hence—3. A bare, level space on the top of a hill; more generally, a high, rolling region not covered by forests.

My bosky acres, and my unshrub'd down.

Shak., Tempest, iv. 1.

My flocks are many, and the downs are large

They feed upon.

Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, I. 2.

4. pl. Specifically, certain districts in southern and southeastern England which are underlain by the Chalk (which see). These districts are considerably elevated above the adjacent areas, and are dry in consequence of the absorbent nature of the underlying rock. They are not forest-covered, but form natural pastures, and are largely given over to sheep-raising. The North Downs are in Kent, England; the South Downs, in Sussex. The one is to the north, the other to the south, of the remarkable district known as the Weald (which see). Various other areas of similar character are called downs, and to this word there is often some geographical prefix, as the North Downs. When used to designate an area of considerable extent, the word is always made plural, and means simply the hills, or the highlands. A limited portion of this high, rolling region is often called the down.—The Downs, as a proper name, a roadstead on the coast of Kent in England, near the entrance to the strait of Dover, where the North Downs meet the coast-line. It lies between the North and South Forelands, opposite Deal, Sandwich, and Ramsgate, inside of the shallow called the Goodwin Sands, and is an important shelter for shipping.

All in the Downs the fleet was moored.

Gay, Black-eyed Susan.

down<sup>2</sup> (down), adv. [Early mod. E. also downe, downe; < M.E. down, downe, earlier dune, dun, down, abbr. of adune, adun, E. adown, < A.S. ādūn, ādūne, also of ādūne, adv., down, orig. of dūne, i. e., from (the) hill: of, off, from; dūne, dat. of dūn, a hill: see down, n. Cf. adown, adv., of which down<sup>2</sup> is an aphetic form.] 1. In a descending direction; from a higher to a lower place, degree, or condition: as, to look down; to run down; the temperature is down to zero.

And afire is Libya the hye, and Lybye the lows, that descends the down toward the grete See of Spayne.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 203.

Mausley, Sir William Temple.

There is a chill air surrounding those who are down in the world.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, IV. 2.

Hence—10. Into disrepute or disgrace; so as to discredit or defeat: as, to preach down error; to write down an opponent or his character; to run down a business enterprise.

He shad'd our dividend o' the crown
We had so painfully preach'd down.
S. Butler, Hudibras.

11. On or to the ground.

No shot did ever hit them, nor could ever any Conspirator attain that honor as to get them down.
Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I. 44.

In our natural pace one foot cannot be up till the other be down.
Howell, Letters, I. III. 1.

12. On the counter; hence, in hand: as, he bought it for cash down; he paid part down and gave his note for the balance.

I will kneel to you, pray for you, pay down
A thousand hourly vows, sir, for your health.
R. Jonson, Volpone, III. 4.

Can't you trust one another, without such earnest down?

13. Elliptically: in an imperative or interjectional use, the imperative verb (go, come, get, fall, kneel, etc.) being omitted. (a) Used absolutely: as, down! dog, down!

Down, therefore, and beg mercy of the duke.
Shak., M. of V., IV. 1.

Down, then climbing sorrow,
Thy element's below!
Shak., Lear, II. 4.

(b) Followed by with, being then equivalent to a transitive verb with down (put, pull, take down), in either a literal or a denigratory sense: as, down with the sail! down with it! down with tyranny!

Down with the palace, fire it!
Dryden.

14. On paper or in a book: with write, set, put, or other verb applicable to writing.

This day is holy; do ye write it down,
That ye for ever remember may.
Spenser, Epithalamion.

Doesn't Mr. Feabrook let you take places for a play before it is advertised, and set you down for a box for every new piece through the season? Sheridan, The Critic, I. 1.

15. In place, position, or occupation; firmly; closely.

He [a worshiper] that sees another composed in his behaviour throughout, and fixed down to the holy duty he is engaged in, grows ashamed of his own indifference and inconstancy, his spiritual dissipations and dryness.
Sp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xix.

Down charge! a command to a dog to lie down, used when shooting with pointers or setters.—Down east, in or into Maine or the regions bordering on the eastern seacoast of New England. [U. dogma, < Gr. dogma, a praising, < dōgma, giving or uttering praise, < dōgē, glory, honor, repute, < dōgō, think, expect: see dogma.] A hymn or psalm of praise to God; a form of words containing an ascription of praise to God; specifically, the Gloria Patri or lesser doxology, or some metrical ascription to the Trinity, like that beginning "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow." The name doxology is also given to the Sanctus or Eucharistic Hymn, founded on Isa. vi. 3, to a series of Halleluiahs (see Rev. xix. 4, 6), to metrical forms of the Gloria Patri, and to other metrical ascriptions to the Trinity. The ascription to the Trinity at the end of a sermon is sometimes called a doxology.

An express doxology or adoration, which is apt and fit to conclude all our prayers and addresses to God.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1886), I. 222.

The Psalms . . . joined three or four together under a single Doxology, came next, according to their present monthly arrangement, in the version of the Great Bible.

draught, draught<sup>1</sup> (draht), n. and a. [This word has changed in pron. from draught (ME. and mod. Sc. pron. draht) to draught (pron. draht, draht), and the fact has been recognized by the spelling draught, which, dating from late ME., is now the established form in the military, commercial, and many technical uses, in which the literary traditions in favor of draught are less felt; in other uses the spelling draught still prevails, though draht is not uncommon in many of them. There is no rational distinction between the two forms; draht is on all accounts preferable. (The f represents the changed sound of the orig. guttural; a similar change is recognized in the spelling draught.) Early mod. E. usually draught, rarely draht (dial. also draught, draht: see draught<sup>2</sup>, draht), < ME. draught, draht, draht, draht, also rarely drahte, also, with loss of the guttural, drawe, a drawing, pulling, pull, stroke, etc., not found in AS. (= MD. draht, draht, D. draht = MLG. LG. draht, a load, burden, = MEG. trakt, G. tract, a load, = Isel. dráttir, a pulling, draft of fishes), = OSw. draht, Sw. dragt = Dan. dragt, a burden, litter, draft; with formative -t, < AS. dragan, draw, drag: see draw. The uses of draht are so numerous and involved that their exhibition in linear sequence is difficult. All the senses attached to the word in either spelling with their quotations are here necessarily exhibited together under draht<sup>1</sup>, draught<sup>1</sup>, although, of course, most of the obsolete senses are found only in the older spelling draught (in its various ME. forms). Modern senses in which the spelling draught is still prevalent over draht are indicated. In cases not so indicated, draht is the prevalent spelling. The compounds in which draught is the only recorded spelling are given under that spelling.] I. n. 1. The act of drawing or dragging (in any sense); a drawing; a draw; a haul; a pull. [In this sense, and in senses 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 14, 16, 19, etc., generally spelled draught. See etymology and examples.]

15. The drawing or moving of air; the air so drawn or moved; a confined current of air, as in a room or in the flue of a chimney. The draft of a chimney depends, apart from the mode of construction, on the difference of the density of the rarefied column inside the chimney, as compared with an equal column of the external atmosphere, or on the difference in height of the two columns of elastic fluid, supposing them reduced to the same standard of density. The velocity of the current is the same as that of a heavy body let fall from a height equal to the difference in height of two such aerial columns. Drafts may be produced or increased (a) by a blast which rarifies the air above the fire (a blast-draft), or (b) by blowers which compress the air beneath the fire (a forced draft). When a forced draft is used on a vessel, air is forced into the fire-room, which is closed in such a way that the air can find access only through the furnaces and funnels. In some recent vessels increased draft has been secured by the partial exhaustion of the air in the uptakes and lower parts of the funnels, which causes an increased flow of air from the fire-room through the furnaces. This is called an induced draft.

The topmost elm-tree gather'd green
From draughts of balmy air.

The older E. form is drake, q. v.; a later form with another sense is dragoon, q. v.] I. n. 1. A fabulous animal common to the conceptions of many primitive races and times, or, as in the Bible, an indefinite creature of great size or fierceness. When described or depicted, it is represented as either a monstrous serpent or a lizard (like an exaggerated crocodile), or a compound of both, or (as in heraldry) as a combination of mammalian and reptilian characters; but always as winged, with fiery eyes, crested head, and terrible claws. It is often represented as blood-red and spouting fire, and sometimes with several heads, like the Hydra; and in the myths of the Scandinavians and other races, dragons are often the guardians of treasure, etc. The killing of a dragon was reckoned among the greatest feats of heroes in both ancient and medieval times; thus, the legend of St. George and the dragon is one of the most celebrated in Christian literature. The dragon is the imperial emblem of China, and is regarded by the Chinese as a sort of divinity, but by other peoples generally as the type and embodiment of fierceness and cruelty or watchful malice. In the Apocalypse "the dragon, that old serpent" is a synonym of Satan (Rev. xii. 9). In the Old Testament it is either a large land-animal or a great marine fish (Isa. xxxiv. 13—revised version, jackal; Ps. lxxiv. 13—revised version, dragon), a venomous land-serpent (Ps. xci. 13—revised version, serpent), or the crocodile (Isa. xlii. 3—revised version, dragon). The same Hebrew word, tanin, is also sometimes translated whale (Gen. i. 21—revised version, sea-monster; Job vii. 12—revised version, sea-monster). The extinct pterosaurops comes nearest of all known creatures to the most prevalent conception of a dragon.

2. In zoöl. (a) A lizard of the genus Draco, specifically called the flying-dragon. It is a harmless creature, of about 4 inches in length of head and body, with a long slender tail, making the whole length about 10 inches. It has a large frill on each side of the body, formed of skin stretched over six elongated hinder ribs, which like a parachute sustain the creature in the air for a few moments. The structure is not a wing, and the animal does not properly fly, the arrangement being such that in the flying-squirrel, flying-leopard, etc. The species are confined to the old world. (b) Any

The English Dragon differs from the improved English Carrier in being smaller in all its dimensions.

Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, p. 144.
3. A fierce, violent person, male or female; now, more generally (from the part of guardian often played by the dragon in mythology), a spiteful, watchful woman; a demon.

Peggy O'Dowd is indeed the same as ever; . . . a tyrant over her Michael; a dragon amongst all the ladies of the regiment. Theatrical, Vanity Fair, 22d.

4. [esp.] An ancient northern constellation, Draco. The figure is that of a serpent with several small colla. It appears at a very ancient date to have had wings in the space now occupied by the Little Bear.

5. A short firearm used by dragons in the seventeenth century, described as having a barrel 16 inches long, with a large bore. Grose.—6. An old kind of standard or military ensign, so called because it was decorated with a dragon painted or embroidered upon it, or because it consisted (like the Anglo-Saxon standard at Hastings, as seen in the Bayeux tapestry) of a figure of a dragon carried upon a staff. A similar standard was in use as late as the reign of Richard I. in England, and is especially mentioned as being in his crusading army. Also called dragon-standard. See drake, 2.

7. A name given to various araceous plants, as in England to Arisaema maculatum; the brown dragon, Arisaema triphyllum; the green dragon, Dracunculus vulgaris, and in the United States Arisaema Dracontium; the female or water dragon, Calla palustris.—8. In Scotland, a paper kite.—9. See the extract.

A dragon is a small Malacca cane, so called from its blood-red colour.

Deben, Selections from Steels, p. 473, note.

Demi-dragon, in her., the upper half of a dragon with head and fore paws (see demi), but always including the extremity of the tail, which appears brought up behind the back.—Dragon china, in ceram., a table porcelain made at Broussay in England, decorated with a design of dragons imitated from Oriental patterns. See porcelain.

—Dragon's head and tail, in astro., the nodes of the planets, especially of the moon, or the two points in which the orbits of the planets intersect the ecliptic; so called because the figure representing the passage of a planet from one node to the other was fancied to resemble that of a dragon. The dragon's head was the point where the planet passes from the southern to the northern side of the ecliptic; the dragon's tail, the other.—Dragon's wings, in her., the two wings of a dragon used as a badge. They are generally represented as displayed, and sometimes a spear or other object is shown between them.—Gum dragon. See trapaenanth.

II. a. Pertaining to or resembling dragons; performed by dragons; fierce; formidable.

The dragon wing of night o'erspreads the earth. Shak., T. and C., v. 4.

Beauty . . . had need the guard

dragonade, dragonnade (drag'ō-nād'), n. [Also written dragonnade; < F. dragonnade, < dragon, a dragon; from the use of dragons in such persecutions: see dragon.] One of a series of persecutions of the Protestants, chiefly in the south of France, in the reign of Louis XIV., carried on by raids of dragons, who were quartered upon the heretics and exercised great cruelty toward them; hence, any persecution carried on with the aid of troops.

He learnt it as he watched the dragonnades, the tortures, the massacres of the Netherlands. Kingsley.

dragon-beam (drag'ōn-bēm), n. In arch., a beam or piece of timber bisecting the angle formed by the wall-plate at a corner, and serving to receive and support the foot of a hip-rafter. Also called dragon-piece.

dragones (drag'ōn-es), n. [< dragon + -es.] A female dragon.

Instantly she gave command (Ill to ill adding) that the dragones
Should bring it up. Chapman, Rym to Apollo.

dragones (drag'ōn-es), n. [< ME. dragones, a young dragon, < OF. dragounet, dragounet (= Fr. dragones), < dragon, a dragon: see dragon.] 1. A little or young dragon.

Each little dragounet, with banners gay, Gaped for the precious prize and gaily lay.
Scott, Rhymer's Song, l. 10.

2. The English name of fishes of the genus Osteoglossum, family Osteoglossidae. The application dragonfish was substituted by Bennett for gobioides, a name by which the Osteoglossum was previously known. See also dragon-fish. See also under Osteoglossum.

3. A name of the very large lizards of South America of the genus Crocodilurus (or Adia), belonging to the family Telluridæ or Anolis. dragon-fish (drag'-on-fish), n. Same as dragon-fish.

dragon-fly (drag'-on-fly), n. The common name of any neuropterous insect of the group Libellulidae or Odonata, and families Libellulidae, Zygoptera, and Agrionidae. They have a long slender body, a large head with enormous eyes, very strong legs, and two pairs of large reticulate membranous wings. They are of swift, strong flight, predatory habits, and great voracity. Some of the species rival butterflies in the brilliance of their hues. The great dragon-fly, Anax grandis, is about 4 inches long. Most of the species are considerably smaller than this. The eggs are usually attached to the stems of aquatic plants, just below the surface of the water. The larva is predaceous, and lives on other water-insects; the pupa is active, and crawls from the water to a plant-stem or rock, where it transforms into the imago. The adult is also predaceous, catching its prey upon the wing. Libellula trilineata is a common species in the United States. Also called damsel-fly, devil's darning-needle, and mosquito-hawk.

And it may be that the delicate-coloured dragon-flies may have likewise some corrosive quality.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 732.

The burnished dragon-fly is thine attendant,
And tilts against the field,
And down the linked sunbeam rides resplendent,
With steel-blue mail and shield.
Longfellow, Flower-de-Luce.

dragoniary, n. [OF., also dragonnier, < dragon, a dragon: see dragon.] Same as dragon.
dragonish (drag'-on-ish), a. [< dragon + -ish.] In the form of a dragon; dragon-like.

Sometimes we see a cloud that's dragonish:
A vapour, sometime, like a bear or lion.

Shak., A. and C., iv. 12.

dragon-leech (drag'-on-leech), n. A kind of medicinal leech, Hirudo interrupta. E. D.

dragonnade, n. See dragonade.

dragonnade (drag'-on-nād'), a. [F., < dragon, dragon: see dragon.] In her., having the hinder or lower half that of a dragon: said of a creature used as a bearing, whose fore part is that of a lion or the like: as, a lion dragonné. Also dragon.

dragon-pole (drag'-on-pōl), n. Same as dragon-beam.

dragon-root (drag'-on-rōt), n. A name given in the United States to the plant Arisema Draconium, and to the root of the Indian turnip, Arisema triphyllum.

dragon's-blood (drag'-on-blūd), n. The name of several resins of a dark-red color. The dragon's-blood of commerce is an exudation upon the fruit of the Calocarpus Draco, one of the rain-palms of the Malay archipelago. It is used in medicines for coloring plaster and tooth-powders, and in the arts for coloring varnish, staining marble, etc. It is largely used by the Chinese. The dragon's-blood of the island of Socotra in the Indian ocean, known from a very early date under this name (the serpent's blood of Pliny), and supposed to be the product of species of Dracopis, is now less little sought. The dragon's-blood of the Canary islands is the sanguineous inspissated juice of the Dracopis Draco, and is no longer in use. The name has also been applied to an exudation obtained from the Persea Draco, a leguminous tree of the West Indies, and to that of the Ostrya Draco, a caryophyllaceous tree of Mexico; but neither substance is met with in commerce.

dragon's-eye (drag'-on-ē), n. The fruit of the Argemone Longissima of China, much resembling the flint, but smaller. Also called longon.

dragon's-head (drag'-on-head), n. 1. A name of plants of the genus Dracopis, of which serpent's is a translation.—2. In her., the name of the tincture shown when blossoming is done by the heavenly bodies.—3. Pale dragon's-head, a plant of the United States, Physalis Physalis, which was originally referred to the genus Dracopis.

dragon-shell (drag'-on-shell), n. The shell of Ocyropsis stolidus. E. D.
dragon's-tail (drag'-on-tail), n. 1. In her., the name of the tincture shown when blossoming is done by the heavenly bodies.—2. In palaeontology, same as discoidal line. See discoidal.
dragon-standard (drag'-on-stan'dārd), n. Same as dragon.

dragon-tree (drag'-on-trē), n. The Dracopis Draco. See Dracopis.

dragon-water (drag'-on-wā'tēr), n. A medicinal remedy very popular in the earlier half of the seventeenth century.

Ran into Bucklebury for two ounces of dragon-water, some spiced and treacle.

Decker and Webster, Westward Ho, III. 2.

Cardus Benedictus
Or dragon-water may do good upon him.
Rendolph, Amynas (1640).

dragonwort (drag'-on-wōrt), n. The bistort, Polygonum bistorta, and with the old herbalists the green dragon, Dracopis vulgaris.

dragony (drag'-on-y), a. Same as dragon.

dragoon (dra-gūn'), n. [Introduced toward the end of the 17th century (formerly also dragoon = D. dragon = G. dragon = Dan. Sv. dragon), < F. dragon (= Sp. dragon = Fr. dragon = It. dragone, in this sense after F.), a dragoon, so called, it is said, "from dragon, a short species of cartine carried by the original dragoons raised by Marshal Bressac in 1654, on the mussle of which, from the old fable that the dragon spouts fire, the head of the monster was worked"; but Littré dates the sense 'dragoon' from 1685, and the name probably arose from dragon in the sense of 'standard': see dragon, 6.] 1. A cavalry soldier. Originally dragoons were a mongrel force, a sort of mounted infantry, armed with muskets or carbines, and serving on foot as well as on horseback; but now they serve as cavalry only. In the British army they are classed as heavy or light dragoons, according to the weight of men, horses, and equipments. The term is not used in the United States army.

Reports and judgments will not do it,

Prior, To Fleetwood Shepherd.

Mr. Gladstone is not the only minister who has defied public opinion, but he is almost the only one in recent times who has dragged a majority of Parliament into sustaining him in it for the lack of any representative man to supplant him.

N. A. Sec., CXXXIX. 104.

dragonadet (drag'-o-nād'), n. Same as dragonade. Sp. Burnet.

dragon-bird (dra-gūn'bērd), n. A large black fruit-crow of South America, Cephalopterus ornatus: so called from the great recurved helmet-like crest of feathers. Also called umbrella-bird.

dragonary (dra-gū'nār), n. A dragoon.

drag-rake (drag'rāk), n. A large heavy rake having crowded curved teeth like a dredge, dragged principally in search of clams. Also called clam-scraper.

drag-rope (drag'rōp), n. A stout rope with a hook at one end and wooden handles inserted between the strands at intervals, used by soldiers for dragging pieces of artillery, etc.

drag-saw (drag'sā), n. A saw the effective strokes of which is given by a drag or pull instead of a thrust.

drag-boat (drag'boat), n. First, a sort of floating anchor for checking the drift of a vessel in a heavy gale, formed of a square sheet, kept stretched by metallic bars, and attached to a beam which serves to float it. Also called anchor-drag and sea-anchor.

dragman (drag'man), n.; pl. dragmen (-men). 1. The driver of a drag or coach.

He had a word for the hostler, . . . a nod for the shooter or guard, and a bow for the dragman.

Theater, Shabby Gentle Story, I.

2. A thief who follows carriages to cut away luggage from behind. [Eng. slang.]

drag-spring (drag'spring), n. In rail.: (a) A strong spring placed near the back of the tender. It is attached by the ends to the drag-bar which connects the engine and tender, and by the center to the drag-bar which connects the train to the tender. (b) A spring attached to the drag-bar to lessen the jerk when starting or increasing speed. [Eng.]
drag-staff (drag'staf), n. A pole pivoted to the rear axle of a vehicle and trailing on the ground behind it, designed to prevent a backward movement of the vehicle when it stops on a steep hill.

drag-twist (drag'twist), n. See drag, 1 (g).
drag-washer (drag'wash'ēr), n. A flat iron ring on the axle-arm of a gun-carriage, having an iron loop attached for the purpose of fastening the drag-rope when necessary. Farrow, Mill. Encey.

draigle (drā'gl), v.; pret. and pp. draigled, ppr. draigling. A dialectal form of draggled.

drail (drāl), v. [A contr. of draggled (cf. drush), prob. due in part to association with drail.] L. trans. To trail; drag.

He returned . . . towards his sheep on the top of the hill, drailing his sheephook behind him.

Dr. H. More, Epistles to the Seven Churches, To the Reader.

II. intrins. To be trailed or dragged.

If we would keep our garment clean, it is not sufficient to wash it only, unless we have a continual care to keep it from drailing in the dirt.

South, Sermons, VI. 4th.

drail (drāl), n. [[drail, v.] 1. A toothed iron projecting from the beam of a plow for hitching the horses to. [Prov. Eng.].—2. A large piece of lead placed around the shank of a large-sized fish-hook, in the form of a cone: used in fishing for bluefish. At the upper end a loop of wire is introduced to hold the line, and the lower end tapers until it meets the shank opposite the point of the hook. When attached to the line a pickled eelskin is drawn over it until the lower end just covers the head.

drain (drān), v. [E. dial. also drawn, draw; < ME. drainen, drainen, dragen (not found), < AS. drōnian, drōnian, drōnian, ONorth. drōnia, drain, a secondary verb (orig. dragan = lecl. draga, intr., draw, trail along), < AS. dragan = lecl. draga, draw: see draw and drag.] The F. drainer, G. dräster, Dan. dræne are from E. drain.] 1. To draw off gradually, as a liquid; remove or convey away by degrees, as through conduits, by filtration, or by any comparable process: as, to drain water from land, wine from the lees, or blood from the body; to drain away the species of a country.

Salt water, drained through twenty vessels of earth, hath become fresh.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Colonies, by draining away the brave and enterprising, leave the country in the hands of the timid and availing.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xiv.

2. To free, clear, or deprive by degrees, as of a liquid; empty or exhaust gradually: as, to drain land of water (the most familiar use of the word); to drain a vessel of its contents; to drain a country of its resources.

Rouse thee, my soul; and drain thee from the dregs Of vulgar thoughts.

Quarles, Emblems, I. Invec.

He [the king] protested that he had been so drained in the late Wars that his Chests are yet very empty.

Hewitt, Letters, I. vi. 2.

II. intrins. 1. To flow off gradually.

It [the meat] was then laid in such a position as to permit the juices to drain from it. Cook, Voyages, VI. iii. 2.

2. To be gradually emptied, as of a liquid: as, the oak slowly drains.

drain (drān), n. [[drain, v.] 1. The act of draining or drawing off, or of emptying by drawing off; gradual or continuous outflow, withdrawal, or expenditure.

The drains on agricultural labor for mill-hands, and the vast cost of machinery, which two or three sand-storms disabled, soon demonstrated his mistake.

Saturday Rev., Sept. 2, 1866.

2. That which drains, or by means of which draining is immediately effected.

When there are no such Natural Drains of Charity as Children and near Relations which need our Assistance. Stillington, Sermons, III. 2.

Specifically—(a) A passage, pipe, or open channel for the removal of water or other liquid; especially, a pipe or channel for removing the surplus water from soils. Drains may be open ditches or sunken pipes or conduits. Those for wet lands are so made as to permit the percolation into them of water from the adjacent soil, as by the use in a covered conduit of porous earthen pipes or tiles, or of a filling of small stones, of an open cut where there is a sufficient slope, etc. See sewer.

Here also it receiveth the Baston drains, Longtort drains, . . . and thence goeth by Mickham into the sea, taking withall on the right hand sundry other drains. Holmshed, Descrip. of Britaine, xv.

(b) The trench in which the melted metal flows from a furnace to the molds. (c) In surg., a hollow sound or canula used to draw off purulent matter from a deep-seated abscess.

3. pl. The grain from the mash-tub: distinctively called brewers' drains.—Gun-barrel drain, a cylindrical drain of small diameter.—Bubble drain, in surg., a drain formed of a layer of rubble-stones laid in a trench.

drainable (drá'ng-bl), a. [drain + -able.] Capable of being drained, as land.

drainage (drá'ng), n. [drain + -age.] 1. The act or process of draining; a gradual flowing off, as of a liquid.—2. The system of conduits, channels, or passages by means of which something is drained.

Their [the Etruscans'] drainage works and their bridges, as well as those of the kindred Pelasgians in Greece, still remain monuments of their industrial science and skill, which their successors never surpassed. J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 288.

3. That which is drained off; that which is carried away by a system of drains; the water carried off by the systems of rivers and their minor affluents in any drainage-basin, or area of catchment, or in any part thereof. See basin, 8, and catchment.—4. In surg., the draining of the pus and other morbid products from an accidental or artificial wound.—Land-drainage Act. See land-drainage.

drainage-basin (drá'ng-bá'son), n. Same as basin, 8.

drainage-tube (drá'ng-túb), n. In surg., a tube, usually of india-rubber, introduced to secure efficient drainage of a wound.

drain-cap (drán'kap), n. A vessel for collecting the drainings or water of condensation from a steam-cylinder.

drain-cock (drán'kok), n. A small cock at the lower end of the cylinder of a steam-engine, for removing water of condensation.

drain-curb (drán'kərb), n. A circular caisson used to support the earth in sinking a shaft. It is loaded with masonry, and gradually sinks through the removal of the earth below it. It forms the base of the shaft-lining.

drainer (drá'nér), n. [Early mod. E. also drayner.] 1. One who drains; one who constructs drains for draining land: as, a ditcher and drainer.

But I am informed that the drainers of the fens have of late . . . wrested the mace out of this bayliff's hand, and have secured this county against his power for the future. Fulder, Worthies, Bedfordshire.

I beg the reader to take the word of an old drainer that it [water] does get in. The Century, XXII. 47.

2. A natural or artificial channel by which drainage is effected.

drain-gage (drán'gáj), n. A device for estimating the amount of moisture which percolates through the soil.

drain-gate (drán'gát), n. A grid or grated opening to a sewer.

draining-engine (drá'ning-en'jin), n. A pump-engine for removing water from mines, low-lying lands, etc.

draining-machine (drá'ning-má-shén'), n. A centrifugal drier. See drier.

draining-plow (drá'ning-plow), n. A kind of plow used in making drains. A form in common use in England has three colters, two mold-boards, and a share. The middle colter is vertical and splits the soil in the middle of the furrow; the two side colters are inclined, to cut the sloping sides of the drain; and the mold-boards lift the soil in two slices, which are delivered on each side of the ditch. The usual dimensions of a ditch thus made are 12 inches deep, 15 wide at top, and 8 at bottom.

draining-pot (drá'ning-pot), n. In sugar-making, an inverted cone-shaped vessel in which wet sugar is drained. Also draining-out.

draining-pump (drá'ning-pump), n. A special form of pump used for raising water containing mud and sand. See pump.

draining-vat (drá'ning-vat), n. Same as drain-pot.

drain-pipe (drán'píp), n. A pipe used in draining.

All gas accumulating within drain-pipes is carried off above the house. Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 8788.

drain-tile (drán'tíl), n. A kind of tile employed in the formation of drains.

drain-trap (drán'trap), n. A contrivance to prevent the escape of foul air from drains, while allowing the passage of water into them. Drain-traps are of various forms. In those represented in the cuts it will be seen that there must always be a certain quantity of water maintained to bar the way against the escape of the gas from the drain or sewer. When additional liquid is conveyed to the trap, there is of course an overflow into the drain. In the left-hand figure the gas is prevented from escaping by a metal plate thrown obliquely over the drain-mouth and dipping into the water in the vessel beyond it.

[In reference to the play of ducks and drakes: see under duck<sup>3</sup>.] A stone made to skim along the surface of the water; the sport of making stones skim in such a way.

drám (drám), n. [Now also spelled drachm, after the L. spelling; < ME. drame, a dram (weight), < OF. drame, also spelled, in imitation of the L., dragma, drachme, mod. F. drachme = Sp. dracma = Pg. drachma = It. dramma = D. drachma = G. drachme = Dan. drakme (of Dan. drøm in sense 4, < E.) = Sw. drachma, < L. drachma, ML. also dragma, < Gr. drachmā, later also drachmā, an Attic weight, a Grecian silver coin.] 1. A unit of weight less than an ounce. The dram is generally supposed to be of Greek origin. Many weights of this denomination and its multiples have been exhibited at Athens, belonging to different systems, of 67, 67, 75, and 78 grains troy, and there were doubtless others. The Solonic dram, the Athenian monetary weight, had at first 67.4, later 68.6 grains troy. The Argimnetan weight was greater, and is fixed by the latest authorities as normally 97 grains. A dram afterward appears in Phoenician systems as a half or quarter of a shekel; and under the Ptolemies there was in Egypt a dram of 64.6 grains troy. Under the early Roman empire a dram was introduced into the Roman system as  $\frac{1}{4}$  of an ounce, equal to 60.5 grains troy. This relation to the ounce has been preserved in several modern systems. Thus, in apothecaries' weight, a dram is  $\frac{1}{4}$  of an ounce, or 60 grains, divided into 3 scruples of 20 grains each. The avoirdupois dram, however (derived from the Spanish adarme), is only  $\frac{1}{4}$  of an ounce, or 27.34 grains. In the old Spanish apothecaries' weight a dram was  $\frac{1}{4}$  of an ounce. In the Neapolitan system 10 drams made an ounce of 413.4 grains troy. The Nuremberg dram was 57.5 grains troy. The Tuscan dramma was 54.6 grains troy. In the Arabian systems the dram is properly represented by the mīkal, but the derham is often called a dram, and was in fact derived from the Attic drachma. Abbreviated dr.

We are not distored by drachms and scruples, for we cannot take too much. Dennis, Letters, xvii.

2. A small quantity. [Rare.]

An inhuman wretch
Un capable of pity, void and empty
From any dram of mercy.

Shak., M. of V., iv. 1.

For (concerning the divine nature) here was not a dram of glory in this union. Dennis, Sermons, I.

3. As much liquid as is drunk at once; specifically, a drink of spirits: as, a dram of brandy.

I could do this; and that with no rash potion,
But with a lingering dram, that should not work Malignantly like poison. Shak., W. T., I. 2.

I was served with marmalade, a dram, and coffee, and about an hour after with a light collation.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. 1. 228.

From the strong fate of drams if thou get free, Another Duryel, Ward I shall sing in thee.

Pope, Dunciad, III. 148.

4. A division (one twentieth) of a raft of staves. See ord<sup>1</sup>, 18. [St. Lawrence river.]—fluid dram, a measure of capacity, equal to one eighth of a fluid ounce, or about a teaspoonful. In Great Britain it contains 64.8 grains of water and measures 3.68 cubic centimeters, while in the United States it contains 37.1 grains and measures 2.30 cubic centimeters. In medical use commonly written ℥ss.

drám (drám), v.; pret. and pp. drámmen, pp. drámming. [drám, n.] 1. intr. To drink drams; indulge in the use of ardent spirits.

He will soon sink; I foresee what would come of his drámming. Poole, The Bankrupt, III. 2.

II. trans. 1. To give a dram or drams to; ply with drink.

Matron of matrons, Martha Bagg!

dráma (drá'má), n. [= F. drame = Sp. Pg. drama = It. dramma = D. G. Dan. drama = Sw. dram, drama (first in L., in the common heading of plays, dramatic persons), < L. drama, < Gr. dráma (-r-), a deed, act, an action represented on the stage, a drama, esp. a tragedy, < dráma = Lith. dráma, do.] 1. A story put into action, or a story of human life told by actual representation of persons by persons, with imitation of language, voice, gesture, drama.

and accessories or surrounding conditions, the whole produced with reference to truth or probability, and with or without the aid of music, dancing, painting, and decoration; a play.

The church was usually the theatre wherein these plays were performed, and the actors were the ecclesiastics or their scholars.

Street, Sports and Pastimes, p. 237.

Westward the course of empire takes its way;

The four first acts already past;

A fifth shall close the drama with the day;

Time's noblest offspring in the last.

Sp. Bards, Arts and Learning in America.

A drama is the imitation (in a particular way) of an action regarded as one, and treated as complete. In the observation of the process of a complete action, and in the attempt to imitate it in accordance with such observation, man therefore has sought the beginnings of the drama.

A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., Int., p. xvii.

3. A composition in verse or prose, or in both, presenting in dialogue a course of human action, designed, or seemingly designed, to be spoken in character and represented on the stage; a form of imitated and represented action regulated by literary canons; the description of a story converted into the action of a play, and thereby constituting a department of literary art: as, the classic drama; the Hindu drama; the Elizabethan drama. The construction of such a composition is, as a general rule, marked by three stages: first, the opening of the movement; second, the growth or development of the action; third, the close or catastrophe, which must in all cases be the consequence of the action itself, as unfolded in acts, scenes, and situations. The drama, whether in actual life or mimic representation, assumes two principal forms, namely, tragedy and comedy; and from modifications or combinations of these result the mixed or minor forms, known as tragic-comedy, melodrama, lyric drama or grand opera, opera bouffe, farce, and burlesque. Other forms, suggested by the subject and the manner of presenting it, are the nautical drama, the pastoral drama, the society drama, etc. Both tragedy and comedy attained a high degree of development in the ancient Greek drama, which originated in the worship of Bacchus.

Sophocles made the Greek drama as dramatic as was consistent with its original form.

Moscowley, Milton.

It is sometimes supposed that the drama consists of incident. It consists of passion, which gives the actor his opportunity; and that passion must progressively increase, or the actor, as the piece proceeded, would be unable to carry the audience from a lower to a higher pitch of interest and emotion.

R. L. Stevenson, A Humble Remonstrance.

In the epic poem there is only one speaker—the poet himself. The action is bygone. The scene is described. The persons are spoken of as third persons. There are only two concerned in it, the poet and the reader. In the drama the action is present, the scene is visible, the persons are speakers, the sentiments and passions are theirs.

Don Boucicault, in New York Herald, July 6, 1883.

8. Dramatic representation with its adjuncts; theatrical entertainment: as, he has a strong taste for the drama.

It was on the support of these parts of the town that the playhouses depended. The character of the drama became conformed to the character of its patrons.

Moscowley, Comic Dramatists.

4. Action, humanly considered; a course of connected acts, involving motive, procedure, and purpose, and by a related sequence of events or episodes leading up to a catastrophe or crowning issue.

The great drama and contrivances of God's providence.

Sharp, Works, I. xiii.

Let us endeavor to comprehend . . . the part assigned to us in the great drama of human affairs.

D. Webster, Bunker Hill, June 17, 1825.

dramatic (dra-mat'ik), a. [= F. dramatique = Sp. dramático = Pg. dramático = It. drammatico (cf. D. G. dramatisch = *Dan. As the days were drawing in, as old ladies say, it was advisable to make the utmost use of the daylight.

Mrs. Ches. Meredith, My Home in Tasmania.

To draw near or nigh, to approach closely; come near.

They drew near unto the gates of death. Ps. cvii. 18.

Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you.

To draw off. (a) To retire; retreat: as, the company draw off by degrees.

Montpensier, finding no prospect of relief from home, and straitened by the want of provisions, determined to draw off from the neighbourhood of Benevento.

Prescott, Ferd. and Ism., II. 2.

To make good the cause of freedom you must draw off from all foolish trust in others.

Emerson, Fugitive Slave Law.

(b) To prepare to strike, as with the fist, in a personal encounter. [Colloq.]—To draw on. (c) [On, adv.] To advance; approach.

Our nuptial hour

Draws on apace. Shak., M. N. D., I. 1.

(d) [On, prep.] (1) To gain on, approach in pursuit: as, the ship drew on the flying frigate. (2) Of a dog, to move cautiously upon (the scented game).

The Wilson's snipe gives forth a strong game effluvia, and it is no uncommon circumstance for a careful dog to draw upon one at a distance of . . . sixty feet.

E. J. Lewis, The American Sportsman (1885), p. 262.

To draw out, to move out or away, as from a station: absolutely, or followed by of or from: as, the army drew out of the defile slowly; the ship drew out from her berth.

To-morrow we'll draw out, and view the cohorts; I'll the mean time, all apply their offices.

Fletcher, Bonduca, I. 2.

The train from out the castle drew

Scott, Marmion, VI. 12.

To draw to or toward, to advance to or in the direction of; come near; approach: as, the day draws toward evening.

Vinto his manoir comyn were many, Which fro hunting were drawing to that place, As wel of gret as smal, both hye and base.

Rom. of Portenay (R. E. T. S.), I. 621.

The heads of all her people drew to me, With supplication both of knees and tongue.

Tennyson, Holy Grail.

To draw to a head. Same as to come to a head (which see, under head).—To draw up. (a) To move upward; rise; ascend: as, the clouds drew up and disclosed the moon.

When the day up dropt & the dym voided, Thus Jason fallt joyfull to that gentill maid.

Destruction of Troy (R. E. T. S.), I. 755.

(b) To form in regular order; assume a certain order or arrangement: as, the troops drew up in front of the palace; the fleet drew up in a semicircle. (c) To come to a stand; halt: as, the carriage drew up at the gate.

I could see my grandfather driving swiftly in a gig along the seaboard road, . . . and for all his business hurry, drawing up to speak good-humouredly with those he met.

R. L. Stevenson, Some College Memories.

(d) To keep company, as a lover: followed by with. [Scotch.]

Gin ye forsake me, Marion, I'll e'en gas draw up w' Jean.

Ritson, Scottish Songs, I. 158.

O cou'dna ye gotten dukes, or lords, Intill your ain country, That ye drew up w' an English dog, To bring this shame on me?

Lady Mairny (Child's Ballads, II. 82).

draw (drā), n. [draw, v.] 1. The act of drawing. Specifically—(a) In card-playing, the act of taking a card or cards from the pack or from another hand; the right or privilege of doing so: as, it is my draw next. (b) In billiards, the act of making the cue-ball recoil from an object-ball after impact, either straight back or slightly starting, by a quick low stroke and immediate withdrawal of the cue.

2. That which is drawn or carried; especially, a lot or chance drawn.—3. That part of a draw-bridge which is drawn up or aside.—4. A drawn game; the result of a game or contest when neither party gains the advantage: as, the match ended in a draw.—5. The act or manner of bending a bow preparatory to shooting.

The utmost care and great practice should be given to acquiring the correct draw.

M. and W. Thompson, Archery, p. 19.

6. The lengthening of an iron rod in forging.—7. The action of the rollers on the fiber in a drawing-frame.—8. The gain or advance of a mule-carriage in drawing out the yarn.—9. Among sportsmen, the act of forcing a fox from his cover, a badger from his hole, etc.; the place where a fox is drawn.—10. Something designed to draw a person out, to make him reveal his intentions or what he desires to conceal or keep back; a feeler. [Slang.]

This was what in modern days is called a draw. It was a guess put boldly forth as fact, to elicit by the young man's answer whether he had been there lately or not.

C. Benda, Cloister and Hearth, v.

drawable (drā'-a-bl), a. [draw + -able.] Capable of being drawn.

drawback (drā'-bak), n. 1. Any loss of advantage or impairment of profit, value, success, or satisfaction; a discouragement or hindrance; a disadvantage.

The avarice of Henry VII. . . must be deemed a drawback from the wisdom ascribed to him.

Halham.

It gives me great pleasure to think of visiting Scotland in the summer; but the drawback will be to leave my wife and children.

Sydney Smith, To Francis Jeffrey, IV.

2. Money or an amount paid back; usually, a certain amount of duties or customs dues paid back or remitted to an importer when he exports goods that he has previously imported and paid duty on, as, for instance, tobacco, or a certain amount of excise paid back or allowed on the exportation of home manufactures. Abbreviated dbk.

Sir John Honour's a Commodity not vendable among the Merchants; there is no Drawback upon 't.

Fam. That's a Mistake, Sir John; I have known a Statesman pawn his Honour as often as Merchants enter the same Commodity for Exportation; and like them, draw it back so cleverly, that those who give him Credit upon 't, never perceiv'd it till the Great Man was out of Post.

Mrs. Centlivre, Artifice, I.

The Irish were allowed to import foreign hops, and to receive a drawback on the duty on British hops.

Lachy, Eng. in 18th Cent., xvii.

3. In iron-founding, a loose piece in a mold. In brass-founding such a piece is called a false core.

draw-bar (drā'-bār), n. 1. A bar used to connect two railroad-cars or locomotives. See drag-bar. [U. S.]

The higher the draw-bar is above the rails the greater will be the tendency to pull the engine down behind and up in front.

2. A bar, or one of a set of bars, in a fence, which can be drawn back or let down to allow passage, as along a road or path. [U. S.]

They were now stopped by some draw-bars, which passed, they found themselves ascending a steep incline, some with large stones.

draw-bays (drā'-bāz), n. A species of lasting, especially for making shoes.

draw-bench (drā'-bench), n. In wire-drawing, a machine in which wire is reduced in size or brought to gage by being drawn through openings of standard size. See drawing-bench and drawing-block.

Solid wire can easily be reduced in size by means of the draw-bench, a contrivance working with a windlass.

draw-bolt (drā'-bōlt), n. Same as coupling-pin.

draw-bore (drā'-bōr), n. In carp., a hole pierced through a tenon, nearer to the shoulder than the holes through the cheeks are to the abutment with which the shoulder is to come into contact, so that a pin when driven into it will draw these parts together.—Draw-bore pin, a joiner's tool, consisting of a solid piece or pin of steel, tapered from the handle, used to enlarge the pin-holes which are to secure a mortise and tenon, and to bring the shoulder of the rail close home to the abutment on the edge of the stile. When this is effected the draw-bore pin is removed, and the hole is filled up with a wooden peg.

drawbore (drā'-bōr), v. t.; pret. and pp. draw-bored, pps. drawboring. To make a draw-bore in: as, to drawbore a tenon.

draw-boy (drā'-bōi), n. A boy who helps a weaver in drawing the heddles to form the pattern of the cloth he is weaving; hence, a mechanical device employed for this purpose.

drawbridge (drā'-brīj), n. [ME. drawbruggen, drawbrugg, < drawn, draw, + brugg, etc., bridge.] 1. A bridge which may be drawn up or let down to admit or hinder communication, or to leave a transverse passage free, as before the gate of a town or castle, or over a navigable river. Formerly also called drought-bridge and drought. See draw. Drawbridges, as applied to fortifications, date only from the beginning of the fourteenth century. At first they spanned the river, leaving the gate of the town or of the advanced work with its outer bank. Later, drawbridges formed only the inner portion of the platform of the bridge, the outer portion being stationary. The drawbridge was usually raised by chains attached to levers projecting from the wall at a proper distance above it, which levers were elevated by heavy weights attached to their inner extremities, the wall forming the fulcrum. When raised, the drawbridge formed a barricade before the gate, thus providing a twofold obstacle to the assailant—a chain and a strengthened barrier.

Drawbridge, Chateau de Montargis, France.

From Istaopolpan to Mexico is two leagues, all on a faire Cansey, with many draw-bridges, throw which the water passeth.

Purches, Pilgrimage, p. 787.

The entrance to the courtyard of the old mansion lay through an archway, surmounted by the foreward tower, but the drawbridge was down, and one leaf of the iron-studded folding-doors stood carelessly open.

Scott, Kenilworth, xii.

2. A bridge one or more sections of which can be lifted or moved aside to permit the passage of boats.

draw-cut (drā'-kut), n. A cut produced by a drawing movement of a cutting-tool.

drawee (drā'-ē), n. [draw + -ee.] One on whom an order, draft, or bill of exchange is drawn—that is, the one to whom its request is addressed; the person requested by a bill of exchange to pay it. See extract under draw, 3.

drawer (drā'-ēr), n. [ME. drawer, drawere; < draw + -er.] 1. One who draws, as one who takes water from a well, or liquor from a cask; hence, formerly, a waiter.

Let them be bawlers of wood and drawers of water unto all the congregation.

Josh. ix. 21.

Put on two leather jerkins and aprons, and wait upon him at his table like drawers.

Shak., II. Hen. IV., II. 2.

The Drawers are the dullest people in it, men of good bringing up, and howsoever wise esteeme of them, none can boast more lustily of their high calling.

Sp. Kerie, Micro-cosmographie, A. Tamerne.

2. One who or that which attracts.—3. One who draws a bill of exchange or an order for the payment of money.

The person, however, who writes this letter [a draft] is called in law the drawer, and he to whom it is written the drawee.

Blackstone, Com., II. 10.

4. A box-shaped receptacle, as for papers, clothes, etc., fitted into a piece of furniture, as a bureau, a table, a cabinet, etc., in such a manner that access to it is had by drawing or sliding it out horizontally in its guides or frame.

At little knowledge or apprehension as a worm shut up in one drawer of a cabinet hath of the senses or understanding of a man.

Locke.

5. pl. An undergarment worn on the legs and lower part of the body by both sexes.

The Maltese harden the bodies of their children by making them go stark naked, without shirt or drawers, till they are ten years old.

Locke.

Chest of drawers, a piece of furniture having drawers to contain clothing, linen, etc. The earlier ones commonly had a box-like compartment above one or three drawers below. The secretaries frequently found among English and American furniture of the eighteenth century, and still common in some parts of the continent of Europe, are chests of drawers with a writing-table above. The only form now commonly in use is the bureau.

The chest contrived a double debt to pay, A bed by night, a chest of drawers by day.

drawfile (drā'-fil), v. t.; pret. and pp. drawfiled, pps. drawfiling. To file by drawing the file sideways along the work, as a spoke-shave is used.

The cutters are backed off on the ends only, their tops being merely lightly draw-filed after being turned up.

J. Smeat, Fract. Machinery, p. 177.

The cone having been turned true, and its surface slightly roughened by drawfiling, it is then changed with four-emery and oil.

Spry, Artisan's Handbook, p. 94.

draw-glass (drá'glás), n. The valve of a still. draw-horse (drá'hórs), n. 1. A harness adapted for draft-horses.—2. The apparatus or parts by which railway-carriages are coupled together, etc. [Eng.]

draw-glove (drá'glúv), n. An old game that consisted in representing words by the fingers: also used in the plural.

Fun and bar practice both at draw-gloss play.

Herriot, Hesperides, p. 303.

After dinner the children were set to questions and commands; but here our hero was beaten hollow, as he was afterward at draw-gloss and shuffle the slipper.

H. Brooks, Fool of Quality, I. 21.

draw-glove (drá'glúv), n. Same as drawing-glove.

The ordinary draw-glass, with cylindrical points and straps up the back of the hand and around the wrist, is preferred by many archers.

Encyc. Brit., II. 576.

draw-head (drá'héd), n. 1. The head of a draw-bar.—2. In spinning, a contrivance in which the spindles are lengthened and receive an additional twist.

draw-horse (drá'hórs), n. In carp., a device for holding work upon which a drawing-knife is used.

There is also a draw-horse, on which Hiah smooths and squares his shingles.

S. Judd, Margaret, I. 17.

drawing (drá'ing), v. [< ME. drawing (def. 1); verbal n. of draw, v.] 1. The act of imparting motion or impulse by pulling or hauling.—2. The act of attracting.

Will not this time of God's patience be a sufficient vindication of his lenity and goodness in order to the drawing men to repentance?

Stillington, Sermons, II. III.

3. The act of forming or tracing lines, as with a pen, pencil, point, etc.; specifically, in the fine arts, the act or method of representing objects on a surface, strictly by means of lines, but, by extension, by means of lines combined with shades or shading, or with color, or even by means of shading or colors without lines; properly, a method of representation in which the delineation of form predominates over considerations of color.—4. A representation produced by the act of drawing; particularly, a work of art produced by pen, pencil, or crayon; also, a slighter or less elaborate work than a picture, very frequently in the sense of sketch, or a hasty and abridged representation of an object, scene, etc., often intended as a study for a more elaborate work to be executed later; also, especially in architecture, etc., a representation of a projected work; a design; a plan.

When they conceived a subject, they made a variety of sketches; then a finished drawing of the whole; after that a more correct drawing of every separate part—heads, hands, feet, and pieces of drapery; they then painted the picture, and after all retouched it from the life.

Sir J. Reynolds, Discourses, I.

5. The art of a draftsman; the art governing the acts and methods included under sense 3.—6. The amount of money taken for sales in a shop or other trading establishment: usually in the plural. [Eng.]—Chalk, crayon, pen, pencil, sepia, water-color, etc., drawing, a drawing in the material or manner of the particular epithet, or the art or method of producing such a drawing. See crayon, sepia, charcoal, water-color, etc.

—Charcoal drawing, a method of drawing in black and white with prepared pieces of charcoal, or the work produced by this method. The paper, which should be of medium weight and regular grain, is first covered with an even flat tone. When the design has been sketched in, the darkest points are marked with a light touch of charcoal, and the highest light is formed by rubbing off the charcoal with a bit of dry bread, so that the extremes may not be lost sight of in establishing gradations. The subject is indicated in broad simple masses, and the delicate tones are blended and softened with a stump.—Out-line drawing, in stained-glass work, a full-size cartoon or drawing on paper of the design, with the leads marked. The glass, being laid over this, is cut by following these lines. The same drawing serves also for leading up the work.—Drawing from the sword, a drawing from a statue, a cast, or any other object in relief or in the round; or the art or practice of making such drawings.—Drawing in two colors, in three colors, etc., a drawing in not more than two colors, as in black and white, or in not more than three colors, etc. The drawing in three colors, or in three crayons or pencils, was much in vogue in the eighteenth century. It was a simplified form of pastel, executed on tinted paper, with a red or pink crayon for the flesh-tint, black for shadows, drapery, etc., and white for lights.—Drawing on the black, or on the wood, the process of drawing a picture, or a picture drawn, on a block of wood prepared for the engraver, who follows it in cutting the surface for printing.—Washed drawing, a drawing carefully worked out in detail, as distinguished from a rough drawing or a sketch.—Free-hand drawing, a drawing produced by the hand guided by the eye alone, without the use of any auxiliary instruments; or the art of making such drawings.—Mechanical or mechanical drawing, a drawing made with the aid of instruments, as compasses, scales, rulers, etc.; or the method or art of producing such a drawing. In drawing a building, or the like, by this method, the standards are conventionalized geometrically, usually falling from left to right at an angle of 45°, and all rays of light are considered to be parallel.—2. Drawing, correctly drawn; symmetrical; in proportion: applied to a work of art or to a natural object, etc.—Linear or line drawing, a drawing executed strictly in lines or with a point.—Monochrome drawing, a drawing executed in one color only.—Out of drawing, incorrectly drawn; out of proportion; inharmonious. Compare in drawing.—Wash-drawing, a representation of an object produced by laying in the shades in flat washes, with merely the outlines and chief details put in in line; or the method, etc., of producing such a representation. This method is much used for architectural drawings, drawings of machines, industrial designs, etc.; and it is also largely practiced in drawing on the block for engravers.

drawing-awl (drá'ing-ál), n. A leather-workers awl having a hole near the point, in which thread is inserted so that it may be pushed through in sewing.

drawing-bench (drá'ing-bench), n. 1. An apparatus, invented for use in mints, in which strips of metal are brought to an exact thickness and width by being drawn through a gaged opening made by two cylinders at the required distance apart and prevented from rotating.—2. A bench or horse used in working with the coopers' drawing-knife.

drawing-block (drá'ing-blok), n. In wire-drawing, a drum or cylinder to which one end of the wire is attached, and which by its motion draws the wire through the drawing-plate, and at the same time coils it.

drawing-board (drá'ing-bórd), n. A board on which paper is stretched for use in drawing.

drawing-book (drá'ing-bók), n. A book for practice in drawing, made of leaves of drawing-paper, usually blank, but sometimes partially printed with elementary designs to be copied in the blank spaces.

drawing-compass (drá'ing-kum'pas), n. A pair of compasses one leg of which has a pen or pencil attached to it, or forming part of it. See cut under bow-pen.

drawing-engine (drá'ing-en'jin), n. An engine for raising or lowering men or materials in the shaft or inclines of a mine. This is generally effected by the revolution of a drum, which winds up or unwinds a rope of hemp or steel wire to which the kibble or cage is attached. The term winding is more frequently used in the United States than drawing, which is common in England, although both are current in both countries.

drawing-frame (drá'ing-frám), n. 1. A machine in which the silvers of cotton, wool, etc., from the carding-engine are attenuated by passing through consecutive pairs of rollers, each pair revolving at a higher speed than its predecessor.—2. In silk-manuf., a machine in which the fibers of floss or refuse silk are laid parallel, preparatory to being cut into lengths by the cutting-engine, to be afterward worked like cotton. E. H. Knight.

drawing-glove (drá'ing-glúv), n. In archery, a glove worn on the right hand to protect the fingers in drawing the bow. Also called draw-glove.

In addition to his bow and arrows, an archer, to be fully equipped, must have a drawing-glove to protect the fingers of the right hand. Encyc. Brit., II. 576.

drawing-hook (drá'ing-hók), n. A clutch-hook used in lifting well-roads. E. H. Knight.

drawing-in (drá'ing-in), n. 1. In weaving, the operation of arranging the threads of yarn in the loops of the heddles.—2. In bookbinding, the process of covering the boards of a book-cover with leather.

drawing-knife (drá'ing-níf), n. 1. A cutting-tool consisting of a blade with a handle at each end, for use with a drawing motion. When used, it is laid transversely to the work, and pulled toward the person with both hands. The work is held by a shaving-knife, clamp, or vice.

2. A tool for making an incision in the surface of wood along the line which a saw is to follow, to prevent the teeth of the saw from tearing the surface of the wood. Also draw-knife.

drawing-lift (drá'ing-lít), n. The lowest lift of a Cornish pump, or that lift in which the water rises by suction (that is, by atmospheric pressure) to the point from which it is forced upward by the plunger.

drawing-machine (drá'ing-má-shín'), n. A machine in which a strip of metal is drawn through a gaged aperture to make it even and thin.

drawing-master (drá'ing-más'tér), n. A teacher of drawing.

The method differs . . . materially from that generally adopted by drawing-masters.

Ruskin, Elements of Drawing, Int. p. ix.

drawing-paper (drá'ing-pá'pér), n. A variety of stout paper made in large sizes, and designed for use in making drawings. For pencil drawings it is generally white, and for chalk drawings tinted. It is usually made of linen stock. There are fourteen regular sizes, generally of about the following dimensions: cap, 13 x 15 inches; demy, 14 x 15; medium, 15 x 22; royal, 16 x 24; superroyal, 18 x 27; imperial, 21 x 29; elephant, 24 x 27; columbian, 25 x 33; atlas, 26 x 33; thesaurus, 28 x 34; double elephant, 32 x 40; antiquarian, 31 x 33; super-royal, 40 x 60; and Uncle Sam, 48 x 120.

drawing-pen (drá'ing-pén), n. A pen used in drawing lines. It generally consists of two adjustable steel blades between which the ink is held, the thickness of the line depending upon the adjustment of the distance between the blades.—Double drawing-pen, a drawing-pen which makes two lines at the same time.

drawing-pin (drá'ing-pín), n. A flat-headed pin or tack used to fasten drawing-paper to a board or desk; a thumb-tack.

drawing-point (drá'ing-póint), n. A steel instrument used in drawing straight lines on metallic plates; a metal-scriber.

drawing-press (drá'ing-prés), n. A machine for forming hollow sheet-metal ware. It consists essentially of two dies, placed one above the other, and operated by means of cranks or other appliances. Each die is in two parts, an exterior and an interior. A piece of sheet-metal having been placed between the dies, power is applied, and the two dies come together, first cutting the metal into the required shape, then holding it firmly by the edges while the interior parts of the dies press together, bending and stretching the metal into shape. The machine makes pans, plates, dishes, covers, etc., complete in one operation. See stamping-press.

drawing-rolls (drá'ing-rólz), n. pl. In spinning-machinery, rolls set in pairs, each turning more rapidly than the preceding pair, through which the silver passes in succession and is thus extended or "drawn."

drawing-room<sup>1</sup> (drá'ing-róm), n. [< drawing, 3, + room.] A room for drawing; specifically, the apartment in an engineer's shop where patterns and plans are prepared.

drawing-room<sup>2</sup> (drá'ing-róm), n. [Abbr. of withdrawing-room, q. v.] 1. A room appropriated for the reception of company; a room in which distinguished personages hold levees, or private persons receive parties, etc.

There is nothing of the copy-book about his [D'Aragon's] virtues, nothing of the drawing-room in his free natural civility.

R. L. Stevenson, A Gossip on a Novel of Dumas's.

2. The company assembled in a drawing-room.

He would amuse a drawing-room by suddenly ejaculating a clause of the Lord's Prayer.

3. A formal reception of company at the English court, or by persons in high station: as, to hold a drawing-room.

Pay their last duty to the Court, and come.

All fresh and fragrant to the drawing-room.

Pope, Satires of Donne, IV. 313.

A drawing-room yesterday, at which the Princess Victoria made her first appearance.

Greville, Memoirs, Feb. 25, 1831.

Drawing-room car. See car.

drawing-table (drá'ing-tá'bl), n. 1. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, a table the top of which could be lengthened by pulling out alides or leaves. It was the prototype of the modern extension table.—2. A table or stand especially designed for use in drawing. drawk<sup>1</sup> (drák), n. [Also drauk, drook (and drawick); < ME. drauc, drauks, drawe, drake = D. draeg, drawick, cockle, daniel.] Daniel; wild oats. [Local, Eng.]

drawl (drál), v. [A mod. freq. form of draw (as draggle, freq. of drag); cf. D. dralen = ODan. dravle = Icel. draula, loiter, linger, similarly from cognates of E. draw.] 1. trans. 1. To drag on slowly and heavily; while or dawdle away (time) indolently. [Rare.]

Thus, sir, does she constantly drawl out her time without either profit or satisfaction. Johnson, Idler, No. 13.

2. To utter or pronounce in a slow, spiritless tone, as if by dragging out the utterance.

Thou drawl'st at thy words,

That I must wait an hour, where other men

Can hear in instantia.

Beau. and Fl., King and No King, I. 1.

II. trans. 1. To move slowly and heavily; move in a dull, slow, lazy manner. [Rare.]

While the first snow was nearly under feet,

A team drawled creaking down Quompegan street.

Lowell, Fitz Adam's Story.

2. To speak with a slow, spiritless utterance, from affectation, laziness, or want of interest.

I never heard such a drawing-drawling rogue.

Shak., M. W. of W., II. 1.

drawl (drál), n. [< drawl, v.] The act of drawing; a slow, unanimated utterance.

This, while it added to intelligibility, would take from palmedody its tediousness.

W. Mason, Eng. Church Music, p. 222.

drawlatch (drá'lach), n. A thief who practised somewhat in the manner of a sneak-thief, watching to see if the people of a house were absent, and then opening the door (drawing the latch) and taking what he could get. Bibston-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy.

If I pepper him not, say I am not worthy to be cald a duke, but a drawlatch. Chettie, Hoffman.

drawler (drá'lér), n. One who draws.

Thou art no sabliath drawler of old saws. Tennison, Sonnet to J. M. K.

draw-lid (drá'líd), n. A lid that slides in grooves.

The box containing the selenium was laid on its side, and had a draw-lid which was kept closed except when exposure was made. Ure, Dict., IV. 791.

drawlingly (drá'ling-li), adv. In a drawing manner; with a slow, hesitating, or tedious utterance.

drawlingness (drá'ling-nes), n. The quality of being drawling.

draw-link (drá'lingk), n. A link for connecting two railroad-cars.

draw-loom (drá'lóm), n. A loom used in figure-weaving. The warp-threads are passed through loops made in strings arranged in a vertical plane, a string to each warp-thread. The strings are arranged in separate groups, and are pulled by a draw-boy in the order required by the pattern, the groups being drawn up by pressing upon handles. It was the predecessor of the Jacquard loom.

drawn (drán), p. a. 1. Undecided, from the fact that neither contestant has the advantage.

If we make a drawn game of it, or procure but moderate advantages, every British heart must tremble. Addison.

If you have had a drawn battle or a repulse, it is the price we pay for the enemy not being in Washington. Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 262.

LG. trüwig, D. trüwig (with HG. ü), sad, mournful, connected with OHG. trüwen, cast down the eyes, mourn, MHG. trüwen, G. trauern, mourn, orig. cause to fall, causative of the orig. verb, Goth. drisān, etc., above.] 1. Sorrowful; sad.

Thus praised that all with drery steuyn, Housend up thaire heuilles till heryn.

They renue the funeral pompe of these great men yearly, assembling thither with plenty of wine and meats, and there watch all night (especially the women) singing drerie lamentations. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 222.

2. Lonesomely dismal or gloomy; exciting a feeling of desolation, sadness, or gloom.

The messenger of death, the ghastly owl,
With dreary shrieks did also yell. Spenser, F. Q.
The breakers were right beneath her bows,
She drifted a dreary wreck.
Longfellow, Wreck of the Hesperus.

On the ridge of the slope (was) an old cemetery, so dreary with its few hopeless fig-trees and aloes that it made the heart ache to look at it.
T. B. Aldrich, Ponkapog to Perth, p. 245.

Hence—3. Exciting a feeling of tedium or ennui; tiresomely monotonous: as, a dreary book.

Chaucer is the first who broke away from the dreary traditional style, and gave not merely stories, but lively pictures of real life as the ever renewed substance of poetry.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 225.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Chaucerian, comfortless, drear, dark.—3. Tedium.

drader (drəd'ēr), n. [Sc., also dradour, driddur, drither; appar. < drad, v.] Fear; dread. [Scotch.]

What alleth you, my daughter Janet,
You look as pale and wan?
There is a drader in your heart,
Or else ye love a man.

Lord Thomas of Winesbury (Child's Ballads, IV. 305).

drudge (drej'), n. [Formerly sometimes written drudge; of LG. origin, perhaps through OF. drage, drage, a kind of net used for catching oysters (cf. mod. F. drague, < E. drag, n.), < OD. draghe, D. drag (net), a dredge, a drag-net (see drag-net and drag); cf. D. drag = LG. drage, drage = Dan. drag = Sw. dragg, a grapnel, drag. The form drudge is practically an assimilation of drag, n., ult. < drag, v.: see drag.] 1. A bush-harrow; a large rake. [Prov. Eng.]—2. Any instrument for bringing up or removing solid substances from under water by dragging on the bottom. (a) A drag-net for taking oysters, etc.

The oysters . . . have a peculiar drudge; which is a thick strong net, fastened to three spils of iron, and drawn at the boats sterns gathering whatsoever it meet-eth lying in the bottom of the water.

(b) An apparatus for bringing up marine animals, plants, and other objects from the bottom of the sea for scientific investigation. It consists principally of a frame of iron and a net which is attached to the frame. As generally constructed, the frame is transversely oblong, generally about three times as long as wide, with straight ends and slightly inclined sides, having the outer edges sharp to serve as scrapers. The net is usually composed of heavy twine, but sometimes of iron chainwork, and is attached to the frame by holes near the inner edges. Fastened to the frame are iron handles, to which a rope or iron chain is attached. (c) A machine for clearing the beds of canals, rivers, harbors, etc. See drudging-machine.

3. In ore-dressing, in certain mining districts of England, ore which is intermediate in richness between "prill-ore" and "halvans"; ore of second quality, more or less intermixed with veinstone. Sometimes written drudge.

Defoe, Tour through Great Britain, I. 120.

drudge (drej'ī), n. Same as drigie. [Scotch.]

drudging (drej'ing), n. [Verbal n. of drudge, v.] 1. The act of using a dredge.

Most of our coasts produce them [oysters] naturally, and in such places they are taken by drudging, and are become an article of commerce both raw and pickled. Pennant, Brit. Zoology, The Oyster.

2. The matter or material brought up by a dredge.

It is not a little curious that these two forms should present themselves in the same drudging. W. F. Carpenter, Micros., § 474.

drudging-box (drej'ing-box), n. [Also formerly drudging-box; < drudging + -box.] A small box, usually of tin, with a perforated top, used to sprinkle flour on roasting meat, on a kneading-board, etc. Also drudge-box.

Cuts of the beating-ladles, dripping-pans, and drudging-boxes, &c., lately dug up at Rome, out of an old subterranean scullery. King, Art of Cookery, v.

drudging-machine (drej'ing-ma-shēn'), n. An apparatus for lifting mud and silt from the bottoms of rivers, harbors, canals, etc. Some drudging-machines employ a single bivalve or clam-shell scoop; others a series of scoops on an endless chain; others some form of suction apparatus. The earliest form appears to have been a single box-like shovel or spoon, suspended from a crane rigged up on a large flat-boat. It was lowered into the mud, dragged along by means of ropes till filled, and then raised and emptied into the boat. An other early form is the chain-pump, which, by means of an endless chain carrying buckets traveling in a trough, lifts mud and water, discharging them at the top into a flat alongside the machine. On this plan are now built some of the largest and most powerful drudging-machines in use. They consist of large, flat-bottomed boats, usually of iron, with a bucket-chain carrying nearly 40 buckets, each with a capacity of about 15 cubic feet. In excavating the Suez canal, the lifting buckets of some of the larger machines had a capacity of 5 cubic feet each, and the delivery was 20 buckets a minute. For the delivery of the sand or spoil both chutes and traveling buckets were used, the spoil being, in some instances, delivered 220 feet from the dredger. The clam-shell dredger is largely used in the United States, and has the merit of ease of management, the scoop operating in a half-circle about the boat, so that a wide area can be excavated without moving the boat. The scoop is suspended from a crane at the bow of the boat, and is operated by means of chains controlled by steam-power, two long flexible poles serving as guides for the clam-shell. In the machines employing a suction or exhaust, a tube is lowered into the mud, and the mud and water are raised by means of a revolving disk in the tube, or by the aid of a vacuum or an ejector. A large vessel on the boat, being exhausted of air, is connected with the submerged pipe, when the mud and water readily rise into the receiver. In another form of pneumatic dredger a pipe is lowered into the silt and closed air-tight, and steam is then turned into the upper part of the pipe, driving out the air. Many other forms are used.

Steam Dredging-machine.

Dred Boat case. See case.

drēal (drē), v. [< ME. drēan, drēien, drēen, drēan, drēan, drēan, < AS. drēgan, drēan, drēan, also do, perform, = Goth. dragan, do military service; cf. draw (drô), n. [In historical books cited also as draw and draw; in Law L. drawes, repr. ME. draw, also draw, pl. drawes, drawes, rarely drawes, a vessel, < AS. dræwa, a valiant man, < Icel. drögr, a valiant man, a youth, = Sw. dräng, a man, a servant, = Dan. dræng, a boy, an apprentice, obs. a footman (whence So. dring, a servant).] In old Eng. law, a tenant in capite. The term was usually or originally applied to tenants holding directly of the king or of ecclesiastical lords, but in virtue of a service less than the knighthood, including commonly some agricultural work, and service as messenger and in the care of dogs and horses. Its application seems to have varied greatly in different places and times; but it implied generally a servile vassal who aspired to be a military vassal.

Bothe of erl and of baroun,
And of draw and of thayn,
And of knith and of sweyn.

Havelok, I. 2182.

It seems, then, that the draw were tenants in pure vil-lenage, bound to the lord, and annexed to the manor, and that they were usually sold with the forest to which they belonged, as mere drudges, to perform the most servile and laborious offices.

Gentleman's Mag. Library, I. 128.

Lanfranc, we are told, turned the draw, the rent paying tenants of his archiepiscopal estates, into knights for the defence of the country.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 98.

(c) In type-founding, a workman who dresses types arranged in rows, removes their defects, and prepares them for sale.

2. A tool, apparatus, or power-machine for cutting and dressing the furrows on the face of a millstone. The simplest of the tools used for this purpose is a pick or light hammer having one or more sharp edges; a block of emery or carborundum, provided with a handle, and having a sharp cutting edge, is also used. In more complicated apparatus, a pick or other similar tool is supported on a frame that travels over the face of the stone. In some cases the stone is set up on edge, as in a lathe; in others it is placed horizontally in the machine under a revolving cutter, which works on a fixed arm radial to the stone, the stone revolving beneath it.

5. A machine for splitting geological specimens. It consists of a strong frame with a pair of chisels, one fixed and the other controlled by a powerful lever. The mineral, fossil, or other material is placed between the chisels and split by pressure.

dress-goods (dres'gûds), n. pl. Fabrics used for women's and children's frocks or gowns.

dressing (dres'ing), n. [ME. dressynge; verbal n. of dress, v.] 1. The act of one who dresses; the act or process of adjusting, preparing, trimming, finishing, etc., in any sense of the verb dress. Specifically, in metal, the mechanical treatment which an ore receives after being brought to the surface; concentration. This is almost always done in water, and with the aid of suitable machinery. (See oil, Mr. Buddell.) The dressing of an ore, or the mechanical treatment, necessarily precedes the smelting, or chemical treatment. In the former it is chiefly the difference in specific gravity between the metalliferous portion of the vein and the veinstone itself of which advantage is taken for effecting a separation. In the chemical treatment the result depends on the various reactions which the substances present have with one another when exposed to a high temperature or smelted.

2. That which is used in dressing or preparing anything, as for use or ornament. Specifically—(a) In med. and surg., the remedy or apparatus applied to a wound or sore, etc. (b) The manure or compost spread over land in preparing it for cropping. drier (drī'er), n. [< dry + -er]. One who or that which dries or is used in drying. Specifically—(a) A machine or mechanical contrivance or apparatus used in removing moisture from some substance: as, a fruit-drier; a clothes-drier; a grain-drier. (b) Any substance added to a paint to increase its drying quality. It may be a liquid, such as Japan, or a dry material, as oxid of lead, oxid of manganese, burnt umber, or sugar of lead. Also spelled dryer.—Centrifugal drier, a machine in which rotary motion is the direct means of extracting moisture. It consists of two circular tubs of metal placed one within the other, the smaller one being pierced with many small holes and revolving on its axis. On placing sugar, wet fabrics, etc., within the interior vessel and setting it in rapid motion, the water is expelled by centrifugal force. See evaporator and tumbler-drier.

drier, drisest (drī'er, drī'est). Comparative and superlative degrees of dry.

drift (drift), n. [< ME. drift, dryft, act of driving, a drove, shower of rain or snow, impulse (not in AS.; = OFries. **dryft* (in comp. ur-dryft) = D. dryft, a drove, flock, course, current, ardor, = MLG. dryft = MHG. dryft, a drove, herd, pasture, drift (of wood, etc.), activity, = Icel. drift, drift, a snow-drift, = Sw. dryft, impulse, instinct, = Dan. dryft, instinct, inclination, drove, (naut.) drift, leeway; with formative -i, < AS. dryfan, pp. dryfen, drive: see drive.] 1. A driving; a force impelling or urging forward; impulse; hence, figuratively, overbearing power or influence.

The drifts of both.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, III. 2.

He threw in some . . . commonplace morality to conceal his real drift.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 418.

5. In geol., loose detrital material, fragments of rock, boulders, sand, gravel, or clay, or a mixture of two or more of these deposits, resting on the surface of the bed-rock. The term drift was introduced by Leell in 1840, to take the place of glaciation, with which latter word the idea of a universal deluge, and especially the Northern deluge, had been generally associated. (See glaciation.) The word drift is now usually applied to detrital deposits when it is intended to include at the same time the transportation from a distance. Almost all detrital material has, however, been formed with more or less help from running water, and therefore must in that process have been moved to a greater or less distance from the place of its origin. It is especially with reference to material lying on the surface in northern Europe and northeastern North America that the term drift is used at present by geologists, and it is frequently called northern drift, since much of it has been moved in a southerly direction. And since ice is believed by most geologists to have been the principal agent by which this drift was made, it is also denominated glacial drift, while the detrital material transported by the agency of ice at the present time is not so called. See glacier and moraine.

6. In mining, a nearly horizontal excavation made in opening or working a mine: nearly the synonym of level. The levels or drifts are the nearly horizontal openings in a mine; the shafts are the nearly vertical openings by which the levels are connected and made accessible. (See level and adit.) A drift is wholly within the soil or rock; an open cut is open to the sky. Also driftway.

7. Naut., the leeway which a vessel makes when lying to or hove to during a gale. Also driftway.

8. In ship-building, the difference between the size of a bolt and the hole into which it is to be driven, or between the circumference of a hoop and the circumference of the mast on which it is to be driven.—9. The horizontal oversetting force or pressure outward exerted by an arch on the piers on which it rests.—10. Slow movement of a galvanometer-needle, generally due to changes in the torsional elasticity of the suspending fiber.—11. In mech., a longish round and slightly tapering piece of steel used for enlarging a hole in a metallic plate; a drift-bolt; a punch. It sometimes has grooves cut in spirals on the sides, to give it cutting edges. Also called driller.—12. Milit.: (a) A tool used in ramming down the composition contained in a rocket or similar firework. (b) A priming-iron to clean the vent of a piece of ordnance from burning particles after each discharge. [Eng.] (c) In gunn., same as derivation, 6.—13. A green lane. N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 302. [Prov. Eng.]-14. Delay; procrastination. [Scotch.]

Trouble upon trouble is the matter and exercise of patience, long drift and delay of things hoped for is the exercise of true patience.

R. Bruce, Eleven Sermons.

dromadognathism (drô-mô-og-nâ-thism), n. [OF. dromadognathus < -ism.] The arrangement of the bones of the palate in the particular manner seen in the Dromadognathus and all ratite or struthious birds, as the ostrich and its allies. The posterior ends of the palatines and the anterior ends of the pterygoids are very imperfectly, or not at all, articulated with the basihypopharyngeal rostrum, being usually separated from it, and supported by the broad, cleft hinder end of the vomer. Strong basihypopharyngeal process, arising from the body of the basihypopharyngeal, and not from the rostrum, articulate with facets which are situated nearer the posterior than the anterior ends of the inner edge of the pterygoid bones. Huxley.

dromadognathus (drô-mô-og-nâ-thus), a. [NL. dromadognathus, < Dromas, the generic name of the emu, < Gr. dromas, jaw.] 1. Exhibiting dromadognathism; having the palate-bones disposed substantially as in the ostrich. — 2. Belonging to or being one of the Dromadognathus.

All the Ratite birds, and the tinamous alone of Cariacae birds, are dromadognathous. Cooper, Key to M. A. Birds, p. 208.

Dromadognathus (drô-mô-og-nâ-thus), a. pl. [NL. < Gr. dromas, swift, fleet, < dromas, a little boat.] An order of extinct birds with tooth, common with the subfamily Odentocoridae (which see).

Dromadognathus (drô-mô-og-nâ-thus), a. [NL. < Dromas, q. v., < Gr. dromas, a bird.] A genus of extinct Australian ratite birds: so called from its affinity to Dromas, the genus of living emus. Also Dromadinae.

Dromadognathus (drô-mô-og-nâ-thus), a. [NL. < Gr. dromas, swift, fleet, < dromas, a running, < dromas, run: see dromedary.] A genus of ratite birds, of the family Casuaridae and subfamily Dromadinae; the emus. Three species are recognized by naturalists, D. neohollandica, D. ater, and D. viridis. In general the characters are those of Casuaridae, the casowaries; but there is no casque upon the head, which is feathered; the beak is comparatively slender; and the rudimentary wings are entirely hidden in the very long and copious plumage which parts along the back and falls on each side in long curly plumes, somewhat resembling hair. The feathers are double—that is, two or even three webs grow from one main shaft. See emus. Also Dromadinae, Dromadidae.

Dromadognathus (drô-mô-og-nâ-thus), a. [NL. < Gr. dromas, swift, fleet, < dromas, a running, < dromas, run: see dromedary.] A genus of ratite birds, of the family Casuaridae and subfamily Dromadinae; the emus. Dromia (drō'mi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. dromios, a kind of fish, < dromos, a running, < dromēus, run: see dromedary.] The typical genus of Dromi- idea. They have 2 pairs of podobranchia, 5 pairs of anterior and of posterior arthrobranchia, and 4 pairs of pleurobranchia.

dromic, dromical (drom'ik, -i-kal), a. [< Gr. dromikos, good at running, swift, fleet, also pertaining to running or to a race-course, < dromos, a running, race-course: see dromos.] 1. Of or pertaining to a race-course or dromos, or to racing.—2. In the Eastern Church, equivalent to basilican as applied to a type of church, from its plan resembling that of a race-course.

In the Eastern church, though the erection of St. Sophia, at Constantinople, introduced a new type which almost entirely superseded the old one, the basilican form—or, as it was then termed, dromical, from its shape being that of a race-course (dromos)—was originally as much the rule as in the West. Encyc. Brit., III. 418.

These remarks of course apply only to churches of the true Eastern type; there are many of the kind called dromic, or basilican, which exhibit the early Western arrangement. J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, I. 170.

Dromiceus (drom-i-sē'i-us), n. [NL.] Same as Dromicus.

Dromicla (drō'mish'i-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. dromiklos, good at running, swift: see dromic.] A genus of marsupials, including the dormouse phalangers, such as D. nana. There are several species of these little phalangers, resembling dormice in habits, and to some extent in appearance; some have a length of only 3 or 4 inches, with the tail about as long. The genus is technically characterized by having only three true molars above and below, and an incipient parachute; it is most nearly related to the pygmy possums, or small flying phalangers, such as Belides and Derobates.

Dromidae (drom-i-dē), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Dromadidae.

Dromiidae (drō'mi'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dromia + -idae.] A family of brachyurous or ano-mous decapodous crustaceans, the sponge-crabs, having remarkably large chela: a transitional group between the Brachyura and the Macrura.

dromoi, n. Plural of dromos.

dromont, dromondt, n. [< ME. dromoun, dromont, dromund, dromande, dromund, etc., = MLG. dragemunt (assimilated to MLG. dragon, draw), < OF. dromon, dromont, later dromant, a small and swift vessel, < LL. dromo (n.), < LG. dromos, a light vessel, dromond, < Gr. dromos, a running, < dromēus, run: see dromedary.] A large, fast-sailing war-vessel; hence, a similar vessel of any kind. Also dromedary.

When at Hampton he made the great dromont, Which passed other great ships of all the commons. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 306.

Roger de Hovenden . . . and Peter de Longtoft celebrate the struggle which Richard I. . . on his way to Palestine, had with a huge dromont. . . This vessel had three masts, was very high out of the water, and is said to have had 1600 men on board. Encyc. Brit., VII. 210.

And of the merchants brought a dromont tall They called the Rose-Berlin.

William Morris, Barthly Paradise, I. 12.

Dromornis (drō-mōr'nis), n. [NL., < Gr. dromos, a running (see Dromaeus), + ornis, a bird.] Same as Dromaeornis. Owen, Proc. Zool. Soc., 1872, p. 682.

dromos (drom'os), n.; pl. dromoi (-oi). [< Gr. dromos, a running, course, race-course, < dromēiv, run: see dromedary.] 1. In Gr. antig., a race-course.—2. In archaeol., an entrance-passage or avenue, as to a subterranean treasury; a way bordered by rows of columns; an alley between rows of statues, as the usual approaches of Egyptian temples.

Alleys of colossal rams or sphinxes form the approach or dromos. C. O. Müller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 219.
